TERENTIUS PUBLIUS, I. This celebrated dramatist, the delight and ornament of the Roman stage, was born at Carthage about the 560th year of Rome. In what manner he came or was brought hither is uncertain. He was, in early youth, the freedman of one Terentius Lucanus in that city, whose name has been perpetuated only by the glory of his slave. After he had obtained his freedom, he became the friend of Lælius, and of the younger Scipio Africanus. His Andria was not acted till the year 587—two years, according to the Eusebian Chronicle, after the death of Cæcilius; which unfortunately throws some doubt on the agreeable anecdote recorded by Donatus, of his introduction, in a wretched garb, into the house of Cæcilius, in order to read his comedy to that poet, by whom, as a mean person, he was seated on a low stool, till he astonished him with the matchless grace and elegance of the Andria, when he was placed on the couch, and invited to partake the supper of the veteran dramatist. After he had given six comedies to the stage, Terence left Rome for Greece, whence he never returned. The manner of his death, however, is altogether uncertain. According to one report, he perished at sea, while on his voyage from Greece to Italy, bringing with him a hundred and eight comedies, which he had translated from Menander; according to other accounts, he died in Arcadia for grief at the loss of those comedies, which he had sent before him by sea to Rome. In whatever way it was occasioned, his death happened when he was at the early age of thirty-four, and in the year 594 from the building of the city. Andria,—acted in 587, is the first in point of time, and is usually accounted the first in merit, of the productions of Terence. Like most of his other comedies, it has a double plot. It is compounded of the Andrian and Perinthian of Menander; but it does not appear that Terence took his principal plot from one of those Greek plays, and the under-plot from the other. He employed both to form his chief fable; and added the characters, on which the under-plot is founded, from his own invention, or from some third play now unknown to us. The long narrative with which the Andria, like several other plays of Terence, commences, and which is a component part of the drama itself, is beautiful In point of style, and does not fail to excite our interest concerning the characters. This play has been imitated in the Arrienne of Baron, the celebrated French actor. The Latin names are preserved in the dramatis personæ, and the first, second, and fifth acts, have been nearly translated from Terence. Steele's Conscious Lovers is the best imitation of the Andria. Eunuchus.—Though, in modern times, the Andria has been the most admired play of Terence, in Rome the Eunuchus was by much the most popular of all his performances, and he received for it 8000 sesterces, the greatest reward which poet had ever yet obtained. In the Andria, indeed, there is much grace and delicacy, and some tenderness; but the Eunuchus is so full of vivacity and fire, as almost to redeem its author from the well-known censure of Cæsar, that there was no vis comica in his dramas. The chief part of the Eunuchus is taken from a play of the same title by Menander; but the characters of the parasite and captain have been transferred into it from another play of Menander, called Kolax. There was an old play, too, by Nævius, founded on the Kolax; but Terence, in his prologue, denies having been indebted to this performance. There is an Italian imitation of the Eunuchus in La Talanta, a comedy by Aretine, in which the courtesan, who gives the name to the play, corresponds with Thais, and her lover Orfinio to Phædria—the characteristic dispositions of both the originals being closely followed in the copy. There is more lubricity in the Eunuchus of Terence than in any other of his performances; and hence, perhaps, it has been selected by Fontaine as the most suitable drama for his imitation. His Eunuque, as he very justly remarks in his advertisement prefixed, "n'est qu'une mediocre copie d'un excellent original." The only English imitation of the Eunuchus is Bellamira, or the Mistress, an unsuccessful comedy, by Sir Charles Sedley, first printed in 1687. Heautontimorumenos.—The chief plot of this play, which we think, on the whole, the least happy effort of Terence's imitation, and which, of all his plays, is the most foreign from our manners, is taken, like the last-mentioned drama, from Menander. It derives its Greek appellation from the voluntary punishment inflicted on himself by a father, who, having driven his son into banishment by excess of severity, avenges him, by retiring to the country, where he partakes only of the hardest fare, and labours the ground with his own hands. The deep parental distress, however, of Menedemus, with which the play opens, forms but an inconsiderable part of it, as the son, Clinia, returns in the second act, and other incidents of a comic cast are then interwoven with the drama. The poet being perhaps aware that the action of this comedy was exceptionable, and that the dramatic unities were not preserved in the most rigid sense of the term, has apparently exerted himself to compensate for these deficiencies by the introduction of many beautiful moral maxims: and by that purity of style, which distinguishes all his productions, but which shines, perhaps, most brightly in the Heautontimorumenos. That part of the plot of this comedy, where Clitopho's mistress is introduced as Clinia's mistress, into the house of both the old men, has given rise to Chapman's comedy, All Fooles, which was first printed in 1605, 4to. and was a favourite production in its day. Adelphi. —The principal subject of this drama is usually supposed to have been taken from Menander's Adelphoi; but it appears that Alexis, the uncle of Menander, also wrote a comedy, entitled Adelphoi; so that perhaps the elegant Latin copy may have been as much indebted to the uncle's as to the nephew's performance, for the delicacy of its characters and the charms of its dialogue. We are informed, however, in the prologue, that the part of the drama in which the music girl is carried off from the pander, has been taken from the Synapothnescontes of Diphilus. That comedy, though the version is now lost, had been translated by Plautus, under the title of Commorientes. He had left out the incidents, however, concerning the music girl, and Terence availed himself of this omission to interweave them with the principal plot of his delightful drama. The Adelphi is also the origin of Shadwell's comedy, the Squire of Alsatia. Spence, in his Anecdotes, says, on the authority of Dennis the critic, that the story on which the Squire of Alsatia was built, was a true fact. That the whole plot is founded on fact, we think very improbable, as it coincides most closely with that of the Adelphi. In Cumberland's Choleric Man, the chief characters, though he seems to deny it in his dedicatory epistle to Detraction, have also been traced after those of the Adelphi. Hecyra.—Several of Terence's plays can hardly be accounted comedies, if by that term be understood, dramas which excite laughter. They are in what the French call genre serieux, and are perhaps the origin of the comedie larmoyante. The events of human life for the most part, are neither deeply distressing nor ridiculous; and, in a dramatic representation of such incidents, the action must advance by embarrassments and perplexities, which, though below tragic pathos, are not calculated to excite merriment. Diderot, who seems to have been a great student of the works of Terence, thinks the Hecyra, or Mother-in-law, should be classed among the serious dramas. It exhibits no buffoonery, or tricks of slaves, or ridiculous parasite, or extravagant braggart captain; but contains a beautiful and delightful picture of private life, and those distresses which "ruffle the smooth current of domestic joy." Phormio—like the last-mentioned play, was taken from the Greek of Apollodorus, who called it Epidicazomenos. Terence named it Phormio, from a parasite whose contrivances form the groundwork of the comedy, and who connects its double plot. It is curious that this play, which Donatus says is founded on passions almost too high for comedy, should have given rise to the most fanciful of all Moliere's productions, Les Fourberies de Scapin, a celebrated, though at first an unsuccessful play, where, contrary to his usual practice, he has burlesqued rather than added dignity to the incidents of the original from which he borrowed. From the above sketches some idea may have been formed of Terence's plots, most of which were taken from the Greek stage, on which he knew they had already pleased. He has given proofs, however, of his taste and judgment, in the additions and alterations made on those borrowed subjects; and, had he lived an age later, when all the arts were in full glory at Rome, and the empire at its height of power and splendour, he would have found domestic subjects sufficient to supply his scene with interest and variety, and would no longer have accounted it a greater merit—"Græcas transferre quam proprias scribere." Terence was a more rigid observer than his Roman predecessors of the unities of time and place. But though he has perhaps too rigidly observed the unities of time and place, in none of his dramas, with a single exception, has that of plot been adhered to. The simplicity and exact unity of fable in the Greek comedies would have been insipid to a people not thoroughly instructed in the genuine beauties of the drama. Such plays are of too thin contexture to satisfy the somewhat gross and lumpish taste of a Roman audience. The Latin poets, therefore, bethought themselves of combining two stories into one, and this junction, which we call the double plot, by affording the opportunity of more incidents, and a greater variety of action, best contributed to the gratification of those whom they had to please. But of all the Latin comedians, Terence appears to have practised this art the most assiduously. Next to the management of the plot, the characters and manners represented are the most important points in a comedy; and in these Terence was considered by the ancients as surpassing all their comic poets. The style of wit and humour must of course correspond with that of the characters and manners. Accordingly the plays of Terence are not much calculated to excite ludicrous emotions, and have been regarded as deficient in comic force. Among all the Latin writers, from Ennius to Ausonius, we meet with nothing so simple, so full of grace and delicacy—in fine, nothing that can be compared to the comedies of Terence for elegance of dialogue—presenting a constant flow of easy, genteel, unaffected discourse, which never subsides into vulgarity or grossness, and never rises higher than the ordinary level of polite conversation. After having considered the plays of Plautus and of Terence, one is naturally led to institute a comparison between these two celebrated dramatists. The improvement of the times brought the works of Terence to perfection and maturity, as much as his own genius. It is evident that he was chiefly desirous to recommend himself to the approbation of a select few, who were possessed of true wit and judgment, and the dread of whose censure ever kept him within the bounds of correct taste; while the sole object of Plautus, on the other hand, was to excite the merriment of an audience of little refinement. If, then, we merely consider the intrinsic merit of their productions, without reference to the circumstances or situation of the authors, still Plautus will be accounted superior in that vivacity of action, and variety of incident, which raise curiosity, and hurry on the mind to the conclusion. We delight, on the contrary, to linger on every scene, almost on every sentence, of Terence. Sometimes there are chasms in Plautus's fables, and the incidents do not properly adhere.—in Terence, all the links of the action depend on each other. Plautus has more variety in his exhibition of characters and manners, but his pictures are often overcharged, while those of Terence are never more highly coloured than becomes the modesty of nature. Plautus's sentences have a peculiar smartness, which conveys the thought with clearness, and strikes the imagination strongly, so that the mind is excited to attention, and retains the idea with pleasure; but they are often forced and affected, and of a description little used in the commerce of the world; whereas every word of Terence has direct relation to the business of life and the feelings of mankind. The language of Plautus is more rich and luxuriant than that of Terence, but is far from being so equal, uniform, and chaste. It is often stained with vulgarity, and sometimes swells beyond the limits of comic dialogue, while that of Terence is puro simillimus amni. The verses of Plautus are, as he himself calls them, numeri innumeri; and Herman declares, that, at least, as now printed omni vitiorum genere abundant. Terence attends more to elegance and delicacy in the expression of passion—Plautus to comic expression. In fact, the great object of Plautus seems to have been to excite laughter among the audience, and in this object he completely succeeded; but for its attainment he has sacrificed many graces and beauties of the drama. There are two sorts of humour—one consisting in words and action, the other in matter. Now Terence abounds chiefly in the last species, Plautus in the first; and the pleasantries of the older dramatist, which were so often flat, low, or extravagant, finally drew down the censure of Horace, while his successor was extolled by that poetical critic as the most consummate master of dramatic art. "In short," says Crusius, "Plautus is more gay, Terence more chaste—the first has more genius and fire, the latter more manners and solidity. Plautus excels in low comedy and ridicule, Terence in drawing just characters, and maintaining them to the last. The plots of both are useful, but Terence's are more apt to languish, whilst Plautus's spirit maintains the action with vigour. His invention was greatest; Terence's art and management. Plautus gives the stronger, Terence a more elegant delight. Plautus appears the better comedian of the two, as Terence the finer poet. The former has more compass and variety, the latter more regularity and truth, in his characters. Plautus shone most on the stage; Terence pleases best in the closet. Men of refined taste would prefer Terence; Plautus diverted both patrician and plebeian." The best editions of Terence are those of Westerhovius, 2 vols. 4to. Amst. 1726; of Edin. 12mo. 1758; of Cambridge, 4to. 1723; Hawkey's, 12mo. Dublin, 1745; and that of Zeunius, 8vo. When Africanus triumphed, Culeo followed his chariot with a pileus on his head. He was some time after appointed judge between his deliverer and the people of Asia, and had the meanness to condemn him and his brother Asiaticus, though both innocent. Liv. 30, c. 45.——III. A consul with Æmilius Paulus at the battle of Cannæ. He was the son of a butcher, and had followed for some time the profession of his father. He placed himself totally in the power of Hannibal by making an improper distribution of his army. After he had been defeated, and his colleague slain, he retired to Canusium, with the remains of his slaughtered countrymen, and sent word to the Roman senate of his defeat. He received the thanks of this venerable body, because he had engaged the enemy, however improperly, and not despaired of the affairs of the republic. He was offered the dictatorship, which he declined. Plut.—Liv. 22, &c.——IV. Marcus, a friend of Sejanus, accused before the senate for his intimacy with that discarded favourite. He made a noble defence, and was acquitted. Tacit. Ann. 6.

Terminalia, annual festivals at Rome, observed in honour of the god Terminus, in the month of February. It was then usual for peasants to assemble near the principal landmarks which separate their fields, and after they had crowned them with garlands and flowers, to make libations of milk and wine, and to sacrifice a lamb or a young pig. They were originally established by Numa, and though at first it was forbidden to shed the blood of victims, yet in process of time landmarks were plentifully sprinkled with it. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 641.—Cic. Phil. 12, c. 10.

Terpander, a lyric poet and musician of Lesbos, 675 B. C. It is said that he appeased a tumult at Sparta by the melody and sweetness of his notes. He added three strings to the lyre, which before his time had only four. Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 50.—Plut. de Mus.

Tertia, a sister of Brutus, who married Cassius. She was also called Tertulla and Junia. Tacit. A. 3, c. 76.—Suet. in Cæs. 50.—Cic. ad B. 5 and 6, ad Att. 15, ep. 11, l. 16, ep. 20.

Tertullianus, (J. Septimius Florens,) a celebrated Christian writer of Carthage, who flourished A. D. 196. He was originally a Pagan, but afterwards embraced Christianity, of which he became an able advocate by his writings, which showed that he was possessed of a lively imagination, impetuous eloquence, elevated style, and strength of reasoning. The most famous and esteemed of his numerous works are, his Apology for the Christians and his Prescriptions. The best edition of Tertullian is that of Semlerus, 4 vols. 8vo. Hal. 1770; and of his Apology, that of Havercamp, 8vo. L. Bat. 1718.

Tetricus, a Roman senator, saluted emperor in the reign of Aurelian. He was led in triumph by his successful adversary, who afterwards heaped the most unbounded honours upon him and his son of the same name.

Teucer, I. a king of Phrygia, son of the Scamander by Idea. According to some authors, he was the first who introduced among his subjects the worship of Cybele and the dances of the Corybantes. The country where he reigned was from him called Teucria, and his subjects Teucri. His daughter Batea married Dardanus, a Samothracian prince, who succeeded him in the government of Teucria. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 108.——II. A son of Telamon, king of Salamis, by Hesione, the daughter of Laomedon. He was one of Helen's suiters, and accordingly accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, where he signalized himself by his valour and intrepidity. It is said that his father refused to receive him into his kingdom, because he had left the death of his brother Ajax unrevenged. This severity of the father did not dishearten the son; he left Salamis, and retired to Cyprus, where, with the assistance of Belus, king of Sidon, he built a town which he called Salamis, after his native country. He attempted to no purpose to recover the island of Salamis after his father's death. He built a temple to Jupiter in Cyprus, on which a man was annually sacrificed till the reign of the Antonines. Some suppose that Teucer did not return to Cyprus, but that, according to a less received opinion, he went to settle in Spain, where new Carthage was afterwards built, and thence into Galatia. *Homer. TEUTA, a queen of Illyricum, B. C. 231, who ordered some Roman ambassadors to be put to death. This unprecedented murder was the cause of a war, which ended in her disgrace. Flor. 2, c. 5.—Plin. 34, c. 6.

TEUTHRAS. Vid. Part III.

THAIS, a famous courtesan of Athens, who accompanied Alexander in his Asiatic conquests, and gained such an ascendant over him, that she made him burn the royal palace of Persepolis. After Alexander's death, she married Ptolemy, king of Egypt. Menander celebrated her charms, both mental and personal, which were of a superior nature, and on this account she is called Menandrea by Propert. 2, el. 6.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 3, v. 604, de Rem. Am. v. 384.—Plut. in Alex.—Juv. 3, v. 93.—Athen. 13, c. 13.

THALASSIUS, a beautiful young Roman, in the reign of Romulus. At the rape of the Sabines one of these virgins appeared remarkable for beauty and elegance, and her ravisher, afraid of many competitors, exclaimed, as he carried her away, that it was for Thalassius. The name of Thalassius was no sooner mentioned than all were eager to preserve so beautiful a prize for him. Their union was attended with so much happiness, that it was ever after usual at Rome to make use of the word Thalassius at nuptials, and to wish those that were married the felicity of Thalassius. He is supposed by some to be the same as Hymen, as he was made a deity. Plut. in Rom.—Martial. 3, ep. 92.—Liv. 1, c. 9.

THALES, I. one of the seven wise men of Greece, born at Miletus in Ionia. He was descended from Cadmus; his father's name was Examius, and his mother's Cleobula. Like the rest of the ancients, he travelled in quest of knowledge, and for some time resided in Crete, Phœnicia, and Egypt. Under the priests of Memphis he was taught geometry, astronomy, and philosophy, and enabled to measure, with exactness, the vast height and extent of a pyramid merely by its shadow. His discoveries in astronomy were great and ingenious; he was the first who calculated with accuracy a solar eclipse. He discovered the solstices and equinoxes, he divided the heavens into five zones, and recommended the division of the year into 365 days, which was universally adopted by the Egyptian philosophy. Like Homer, he looked upon water as the principle of every thing. He was the founder of the Ionic sect, which distinguished itself for its deep and abstruse speculations under the successors and pupils of the Milesian philosopher, Anaximander, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, and Archelaus, the master of Socrates. Thales was never married; and when his mother pressed him to choose a wife, he said he was too young. The same exhortations were afterwards repeated, but the philosopher eluded them by observing that he was then too old to enter the matrimonial state. He died in the 96th year of his age, about 548 years before the Christian era. His compositions on philosophical subjects are lost. Herodot. 1, c. 7.—Plato.—Diog. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. &c.——II. A lyric poet of Crete, intimate with Lycurgus. He prepared, by his rhapsodies, the minds of the Spartans to receive the rigorous institutions of his friend, and inculcated a reverence for the peace of civil society.

THALESTRIA, or THALESTRIS, a queen of the Amazons, who, accompanied by 300 women, came 35 days' journey to meet Alexander in his Asiatic conquests, to raise children by a man whose fame was so great, and courage so uncommon. Curt. 6, c. 5.—Strab. 11.—Justin. 2, c. 4.

THALYSSIA, Greek festivals, celebrated by the people of the country in honour of Ceres, to whom the first fruits were regularly offered. Schol. Theocr. 5.

THAMYRAS, or THAMYRIS. Vid. Part III.

THARGELIA, festivals in Greece, in honour of Apollo and Diana. They lasted two days, and the youngest of both sexes carried olive branches, on which were suspended cakes and fruits. Athen. 12.

THASIUS, or THRASIUS, a famous soothsayer of Cyprus, who told Busiris, king of Egypt, that to stop a dreadful plague which afflicted his country he must offer a foreigner to Jupiter. Upon this the tyrant ordered him to be seized and sacrificed to the god, as he was not a native of Egypt. Ovid. de Art. Am. 1, v. 549.

THEAGENES, an athlete of Thasos, famous for his strength. His father's name was Timosthenes, a friend of Hercules. He was crowned above a thousand times at the public games of the Greeks, and became a god after death. Paus. 6, c. 6 and 11.—Plut.

THEAGES, a Greek philosopher, disciple of Socrates. Plato.—Ælian. V. H. 4, &c.

THEANO, I. the wife of Metapontus, son of Sisyphus, presented twins to her husband when he wished to repudiate her for her barrenness. The children were educated with the greatest care, and some time afterwards Theano herself became mother of twins. When they were grown up she encouraged them to murder the supposititious children, who were to succeed to their father's throne in preference to them. They were both killed in the attempt, and the father, displeased with the conduct of Theano, repudiated her to marry the mother of the children whom he had long considered as his own. Hygin. fab. 186.——II. A daughter of Cisseus, sister to Hecuba, who married Antenor, and was supposed to have betrayed the Palladium to the Greeks, as she was priestess of Minerva. Homer. Il. 6, v. 298.—Paus. 10, c. 27.—Dictys Cret. 5, c. 8.——III. The wife of the philosopher Pythagoras, daughter of Pythanax of Crete, or, according to others, of Brontinus of Crotona. Diog. 8, c. 42.——IV. A priestess of Athens, daughter of Menon, who refused to pronounce a curse upon Alcibiades when he was accused of having mutilated all the statues of Mercury. Plut.——V. The mother of Pausanias. She was the first, as it is reported, who brought a stone to the entrance of Minerva's temple, to shut up her son when she heard of his crimes and perfidy to his country. Polyæn. 8.

THEMISON, I. a famous physician of Laodicea, disciple to Asclepiades. He was founder of a sect called methodists, because he wished to introduce methods to facilitate the learning and the practice of physic. He flourished in the Augustan age. Plin. 29, c. 1.—Juv. 10. ——II. One of the generals and ministers of Antiochus the Great. He was born at Cyprus. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 41.

THEMISTIUS, a celebrated philosopher of Paphlagonia, in the age of Constantius, greatly esteemed by the Roman emperors, and called Euphrades, the fine speaker, from his eloquent and commanding delivery. He was made a Roman senator, and always distinguished for his liberality and munificence. His school was greatly frequented. He wrote, when young, some commentaries on Aristotle, fragments of which are still extant, and 33 of his orations. The best edition of Themistius is that of Harduin, fol. Paris, 1684.

THEMISTO. Vid. Part III.

THEMISTOCLES, I. a celebrated general, born at Athens. His father's name was Neocles, and his mother's Euterpe, or Abrotonum, a native of Halicarnassus, or of Thrace, or Acarnania. The beginning of his youth was marked by vices so flagrant, and an inclination so incorrigible, that his father disinherited him. This, which might have disheartened others, roused the ambition of Themistocles, and the protection which he was denied at home, he sought in courting the favours of the populace, and in sharing the administration of public affairs. When Xerxes invaded Greece, Themistocles was at the head of the Athenian republic, and in this capacity the fleet was entrusted to his care. While the Lacedæmonians under Leonidas were opposing the Persians at Thermopylæ, the naval operations of Themistocles, and the combined fleet of the Peloponnesians were directed to destroy the armament of Xerxes and to ruin his maritime power. The obstinate wish of the generals to command the Grecian fleet might have proved fatal to the interest of the allies, had not Themistocles freely relinquished his pretensions, and, by nominating his rival Eurybiades master of the expedition, shown the world that his ambition could stoop when his country demanded his assistance. The Persian fleet was distressed at Artemisium by a violent storm, and the feeble attack of the Greeks; but a decisive battle had never been fought, if Themistocles had not used threats and entreaties, and even called religion to his aid, and the favourable answers of the oracle to second his measures. The Greeks, actuated by different views, were unwilling to make head by sea against an enemy whom they saw victorious by land, plundering their cities, and destroying all by fire and sword; but before they were dispersed, Themistocles sent intelligence of their intentions to the Persian monarch. Xerxes, by immediately blocking them with his fleet in the bay of Salamis, prevented their escape; and while he wished to crush them all at one blow, he obliged them to fight for their safety, as well as for the honour of their country. This battle, which was fought near the island of Salamis, B. C. 480, was decisive; the Greeks obtained the victory, and Themistocles the honour of having destroyed the formidable navy of Xerxes. Further to insure the peace of his country, Themistocles informed the Asiatic monarch that the Greeks had conspired to cut the bridge which he had built across the Hellespont, and to prevent his retreat into Asia. This met with equal success; Xerxes hastened away from Greece, and while he believed, on the words of Themistocles, that his return would be disputed, he left his forces without a general, and his fleets an easy conquest to the victorious Greeks. These signal services to his country endeared Themistocles to the Athenians, and he was universally called the most warlike and most courageous of all the Greeks who fought against the Persians. He was received with the most distinguished honours, and by his prudent administration Athens was soon fortified with strong walls, her Piræus was rebuilt, and her harbours were filled with a numerous and powerful navy, which rendered her the mistress of Greece. Yet in the midst of that glory the conqueror of Xerxes incurred the displeasure of his countrymen, which had proved so fatal to many of his illustrious predecessors. He was banished from the city, and after he had sought in vain a safe retreat among the republics of Greece and the barbarians of Thrace, he threw himself into the arms of a monarch whose fleets he had defeated, and whose father he had ruined. Artaxerxes, the successor of Xerxes, received the illustrious Athenian with kindness; and though he had formerly set a price upon his head, yet he made him one of his greatest favourites, and bestowed three rich cities upon him, to provide him with bread, wine, and meat. Such kindness from a monarch, from whom he perhaps expected the most hostile treatment, did not alter the sentiments of Themistocles. He still remembered that Athens gave him birth, and, according to some writers, the wish of not injuring his country, and therefore his inability of carrying on war against Greece, at the request of Artaxerxes, obliged him to destroy himself by drinking bull's blood. The manner of his death, however, is uncertain; and while some affirm that he poisoned himself, others declare that he fell a prey to a violent distemper in the city of Magnesia, where he had fixed his residence, while in the dominions of the Persian monarch. His bones were conveyed to Attica, and honoured with a magnificent tomb by the Athenians, who began to repent too late of their cruelty to the saviour of his country. Themistocles died in the 65th year of his age, about 449 years before the Christian era. He has been admired as a man naturally courageous, of a disposition fond of activity, ambitious of glory and enterprise. Blessed with a provident and discerning mind, he seemed to rise superior to misfortunes, and in the midst of adversity, possessed of resources which could enable him to regain his splendour, and even to command fortune. Plut. & C. Nep. in vitâ. —Paus. 1, c. 1. 8, c. 52.—Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 12, l. 9, c. 18, l. 13, c. 40.——II. A writer, some of whose letters are extant.

THEMISTOCLES, a historian of Syracuse, in the age of Artaxerxes Mnemon. He wrote on the wars of Cyrus the younger, a subject ably treated afterwards by Xenophon.

THEOCLYMENUS, a soothsayer of Argolis, descended from Melampus. His father's name was Thestor. He foretold the speedy return of Ulysses to Penelope and Telemachus. Homer. Od. 15, v. 225, &c.—Hygin. fab. 128.

THEOCRITUS, I. a Greek poet, who flourished at Syracuse, in Sicily, 282 B. C. His father's name was Praxagoras or Simichus, and his mother's, Philina. He lived in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus, whose praises he sung and whose favours he enjoyed. Theocritus distinguished himself by his poetical compositions, of which 30 idyllia and some epigrams are extant, written in the Doric dialect, and admired for their beauty, elegance, and simplicity. Virgil, in his eclogues, has imitated and often copied him. Theocritus has been blamed for the many indelicate and obscene expressions which he uses, and while he introduces shepherds and peasants, with all the rusticity and ignorance of nature, he often disguises their character by making them speak on high and exalted subjects. It is said he wrote some invectives against Hiero, king of Syracuse, who ordered him to be strangled. He also wrote a ludicrous poem, called Syrinx, and placed his verses in such order that they represented the pipe of the god Pan. The best editions of Theocritus are Warton's, 2 vols. 4to. Oxon. 1770; that of Heinsius, 8vo. Oxon. 1699; that of Valkenaer, 8vo. L. Bat. 1781; and that of Reiske, 2 vols. 4to. Lips. 1760. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Laert. 5.——II. A Greek historian of Chios, who wrote an account of Lybia. Plut.

THEODECTES, a Greek orator and poet of Phaselis, in Pamphylia, son of Aristander and disciple of Isocrates. He wrote 50 tragedies, besides other works now lost. He had such a happy memory, that he could repeat with ease whatever verses were spoken in his presence. When Alexander passed through Phaselis, he crowned with garlands the statue that had been erected to the memory of the deceased poet. Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 24, in Orat. 51, &c.—Plut.—Quintil.

THEODORA, I. a daughter-in-law of the emperor Maximian, who married Constantius.——II. A daughter of Constantine.——III. A woman who, from being a courtesan, became empress to Justinian, and distinguished herself by her intrigues and enterprises.——The name of Theodora is common to the emperesses of the East in a later period.

THEODORETUS, one of the Greek fathers, who flourished A. D. 425, whose works have been edited, 5 vols. fol. Paris, 1642, and 5 vols. Halæ, 1769 to 1774.

THEODORITUS, a Greek ecclesiastical historian, whose works have been best edited by Reading, fol. Cantab. 1720.

THEODORUS, I. a Syracusan, of great authority among his countrymen, who severely inveighed against the tyranny of Dionysius.——II. A philosopher, disciple to Aristippus. He denied the existence of a god. He was banished from Cyrene, and fled to Athens, where the friendship of Demetrius Phalereus saved him from the accusations which were carried to the Areopagus against him. Some suppose that he was at last condemned to death for his impiety, and that he drank poison.——III. A preceptor to one of the sons of Antony, whom he betrayed to Augustus.——IV. A consul in the reign of Honorius. Claudian wrote a poem upon him, in which he praises him with great liberality.——V. A secretary of Valens. He conspired against the emperor, and was beheaded.——VI. A man who compiled a history of Rome. Of this nothing but his history of the reigns of Constantine and Constantius is extant.——VII. A Greek poet, in the age of Cleopatra. He wrote a book of metamorphosis, which Ovid imitated, as some suppose.——VIII. An artist of Samos, about 700 years B. C. He was the first who found out the art of melting iron, with which he made statues.——IX. A Greek writer, called also Prodromus. The time in which he lived is unknown. There is a romance of his composition extant, called the amours of Rhodanthe and Dosicles. The only edition of which was by Gaulminus, 8vo. Paris, 1625.

THEODOSIUS FLAVIUS, a Roman emperor, surnamed Magnus, from the greatness of his exploits. He was invested with the imperial purple by Gratian, and appointed over Thrace and the eastern provinces, which had been in the possession of Valentinian. The first years of his reign were marked by different conquests over the barbarians. The Goths were defeated in Thrace, and 4000 of their chariots, with an immense number of prisoners of both sexes, were the reward of the victory. This glorious campaign intimidated the inveterate enemies of Rome; they sued for peace and treaties of alliance were made with distant nations, who wished to gain the favours and the friendship of a prince whose military virtues were so conspicuous. Some conspiracies were formed against the emperor, but Theodosius totally disregarded them; and while he punished his competitors for the imperial purple, he thought himself sufficiently secure in the love and the affection of his subjects. His reception at Rome was that of a conqueror; he triumphed over the barbarians, and restored peace in every part of the empire. He died of a dropsy, at Milan, in the 60th year of his age, after a reign of 16 years, the 17th of January, A. D. 395. His body was conveyed to Constantinople, and buried by his son Arcadius in the tomb of Constantine. Theodosius was the last of the emperors who was the sole master of the whole Roman empire. He left three children, Arcadius and Honorius, who succeeded him, and Pulcheria. Theodosius has been commended by ancient writers, as a prince blessed with every virtue, and debased by no vicious propensity. Though master of the world, he was a stranger to that pride and arrogance which too often disgrace the monarch; he was affable in his behaviour, benevolent, and compassionate; and it was his wish to treat his subjects as he himself was treated when a private man and a dependant. Men of merit were promoted to places of trust and honour, and the emperor was fond of patronising the cause of virtue and learning. His zeal as a follower of Christianity has been applauded by all the ecclesiastical writers, and it was the wish of Theodosius to support the revealed religion, as much by his example, meekness, and Christian charity, as by his edicts and ecclesiastical institutions. His want of clemency, however, in one instance, was too openly betrayed, and when the people of Thessalonica had, unmeaningly perhaps, killed one of his officers, the emperor ordered his soldiers to put all the inhabitants to the sword, and no less than 6000 persons, without distinction of rank, age, or sex, were cruelly butchered in that town in the space of three hours. This violence irritated the ecclesiastics, and Theodosius was compelled by St. Ambrose to do open penance in the church, and publicly to make atonement for an act of barbarity which had excluded him from the bosom of the church and the communion of the faithful. In his private character Theodosius was an example of soberness and temperance, his palace displayed becoming grandeur, but still with moderation. He never indulged luxury or countenanced superfluities. He was fond of bodily exercise, and never gave himself up to pleasure and enervating enjoyments. The laws and regulations which he introduced in the Roman empire were of the most salutary nature. Socrat. 5, &c.—Zosim. 4, &c.—Ambros. Augustin. Claudian. &c.—— The 2d, succeeded his father Arcadius as emperor of the western Roman empire, though only in the eighth year of his age. He was governed by his sister Pulcheria, and by his ministers and eunuchs, in whose hands was the disposal of the offices of state, and all places of trust and honour. He married Eudoxia, the daughter of a philosopher called Leontius, a woman remarkable for her virtues and piety. The territories of Theodosius were invaded by the Persians, but the emperor soon appeared at the head of a numerous force, and the two hostile armies met on the frontiers of the empire. The consternation was universal on both sides; without even a battle the Persians fled, and no less than 100,000 were lost in the waters of the Euphrates. Theodosius raised the siege of Nisibis, where his operations failed of success, and he averted the fury of the Huns and Vandals by bribes and promises. He died on the 28th of July, in the 49th year of his age, A. D. 450, leaving only one daughter, Licinia Eudoxia, whom he had married to the emperor Valentinian 3d. The carelessness and inattention of Theodosius to public affairs are well known. He signed all the papers that were brought to him, without even opening them or reading them, till his sister apprized him of his negligence, and rendered him more careful and vigilant, by making him sign a paper in which he delivered into her hands Eudoxia his wife and a slave and menial servant. The laws and regulations which were promulgated under his name, and selected from the most useful and salutary institutions of his imperial Theodosian Code. Theodosius was a warm advocate for the Christian religion, but he has been blamed for his partial attachment to those who opposed the orthodox faith. Zosim.—Soc. &c.——A celebrated mathematician of Tripoli, who flourished 75 years before C. His treatise called Sphærica, is best known, as published by Hunt, 8vo. Oxon. 1707.——A Roman general, father of Theodosius the Great; he was killed A. D. 376.

THEODŌTUS, I. an admiral of the Rhodians, who was sent by his countrymen to make a treaty with the Romans.——II. A native of Chios, who, as preceptor and counsellor of Ptolemy, advised the feeble monarch to murder Pompey. He carried the head of the unfortunate Roman to Cæsar, but the resentment of the conqueror was such that the mean assassin fled; and, after a wandering and miserable life in the cities of Asia, he was at last put to death by Brutus. Plut. in Brut. & Pomp.——III. A governor of Bactriana in the age of Antiochus, who revolted and made himself king, B. C. 250.

THEOGNIS, a Greek poet of Megara, who flourished about 549 years before Christ. He wrote several poems, of which only a few sentences are now extant, quoted by Plato and other Greek historians and philosophers, and intended as precepts for the conduct of human life. The morals of the poet have been censured as neither decorous nor chaste. The best edition of Theognis is that of Blackwall, 12mo. London. 1706.——There was also a tragic poet of the same name, whose compositions were so lifeless and inanimated, that they procured him the name of Chion or snow.

THEOMNESTUS, I. a rival of Nicias in the administration of public affairs at Athens. Strab. 14.——II. An Athenian philosopher, among the followers of Plato's doctrines He had Brutus, Cæsar's murderer, among his pupils.

THEOPHANES, I. a Greek historian, born at Mitylene. He was very intimate with Pompey, and from his friendship with the Roman general his countrymen derived many advantages. After the battle of Pharsalia he advised Pompey to retire to the court of Egypt. Cic. pro Arch. & Paterc.—Plut. in Cic. & Pomp.—— II. His son, M. Pompeius Theophanes, was made governor of Asia, and enjoyed the intimacy of Tiberius.—The only edition of Theophanes, the Byzantine historian, is at Paris, fol. 1649.

THEOPHRASTUS, a native of Eresus, in Lesbos, son of a fuller. He studied under Plato, and afterwards under Aristotle, whose friendship he gained, and whose warmest commendations he deserved. His original name was Tyrtamus, but this the philosopher made him exchange for that of Euphrastus, to imitate his excellence in speaking, and afterwards for that of Theophrastus, which he deemed still more expressive of his eloquence, the brilliancy of his genius, and the elegance of his language. After the death of Socrates, when the malevolence of the Athenians drove all the philosopher's friends from the city, Theophrastus succeeded Aristotle in the Lyceum, and rendered himself so conspicuous, that in a short time the number of his auditors was increased to two thousand. Not only his countrymen courted his applause, but kings and princes were desirous of his friendship; and Cassander and Ptolemy, two of the most powerful of the successors of Alexander, regarded him with more than usual partiality. Theophrastus composed many books, and Diogenes has enumerated the titles of above 200 treatises, which he wrote with great elegance and copiousness. About 20 of these are extant, among which are his history of stones, his treatise on plants, on the winds, on the signs of fair weather, &c. and his Characters, an excellent moral treatise, which was begun in the 99th year of his age.

He died, loaded with years and infirmities, in the 107th year of his age, B. C. 288, lamenting the shortness of life, and complaining of the partiality of nature in granting longevity to the crow and to the stag, but not to man. To his care we are indebted for the works of Aristotle, which the dying philosopher intrusted to him. The best edition of Theophrastus is that of Heinsius, fol. L. Bat. 1613; and of his Characters, that of Needham, 8vo. Cantab. 1712, and that of Fischer, 8vo. Coburg. 1763. Cic. Tusc. 3, c. 28. in Brut. c. 31. in Orat. 19, &c.—Strab. 13.—Diog. in vitâ.—Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 8, l. 34, c. 20, l. 8, c. 12.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Plut. ad-colot.

THEOPOMPUS, I. a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidæ, who succeeded his father Nicander, and distinguished himself by the many new regulations he introduced. He created the Ephori, and died after a long and peaceful reign, B. C. 723. While he sat on the throne the Spartans made war against Messenia. Plut. in Lyc.—Paus. 3, c. 7.——II. A famous Greek historian, of Chios, disciple of Isocrates, who flourished B. C. 354. All his compositions are lost, except a few fragments quoted by ancient writers. He is compared to Thucydides and Herodotus as an historian, yet he is severely censured for his satirical remarks and illiberal reflections. He obtained a prize in which his master was a competitor, and he was liberally rewarded for composing the best funeral oration in honour of Mausolus. His father's name was Damasistratus. Dionys. Hal. 1.—Plut. in Lys.—C. Nep. 7.—Paus. 6, c. 18.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.——III. An Athenian, who attempted to deliver his countrymen from the tyranny of Demetrius. Polyæn. 5.——IV. A comic poet in the age of Menander. He wrote 24 plays, all lost.——V. A son of Demaratus, who obtained several crowns at the Olympic games. Paus. 6, c. 10.——VI. An orator and historian of Cnidus, very intimate with J. Cæsar. Strab. 14.——VII. A Spartan general, killed at the battle of Tegyra.——VIII. A philosopher of Cheronæa, in the reign of the emperor Philip.

THEOPHYLACTUS, SIMOCATTA, I. a Byzantine historian, whose works were edited fol. Paris. 1647.——II. One of the Greek fathers, who flourished A. D. 1070. His works were edited at Venice, 4 vols. 1754 to 1763.

THEOXĔNA, a noble lady of Thessaly, who threw herself into the sea when unable to escape from the soldiers of King Philip, who pursued her. Liv. 40, c. 4.

THEOXENIA, a festival celebrated in honour of all the gods in every city of Greece, but especially at Athens. Games were then observed, and the conqueror who obtained the prize, received a large sum of money, or, according to others, a vest beautifully ornamented.—The Dioscuri established a festival of the same name, in honour of the gods who had visited them at one of their entertainments.

THERAMĔNES, an Athenian philosopher and general in the age of Alcibiades. His father's name was Agnon. He was one of the 30 tyrants of Athens, but he had no share in the cruelties and oppressions which disgraced their administration. He was accused by Critias, one of his colleagues, because he opposed their views, and he was condemned to drink hemlock, though defended by his own innocence and the friendly intercession of the philosopher Socrates. He drank the poison with great composure, and poured some of it on the ground with the sarcastical exclamation of, This is to the health of Critias. This happened about 404 years before the Christian era. Theramenes, on account of the fickleness of his disposition, has been called Cothurnus, a part of the dress used both by men and women. Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 16.—Plut. in Alcib. &c.—C. Nep.

THERON, a tyrant of Agrigentum, who died 472 B. C. He was a native of Bœotia, and son of Ænesidamus, and he married Demarete, the daughter of Gelon of Sicily. Herodot. 7.—Pind. Olymp. 2.

THERSANDER, a son of Polynices and Argia. He accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, but he was killed in Mysia by Telephus, before the confederate army reached the enemy's country. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 261.—Apollod. 3, c. 7.

THERSITES, the most deformed of the Greeks during the Trojan war. He was fond of ridiculing his fellow-soldiers, particularly Agamemnon, Achilles, and Ulysses. Achilles killed him with one blow of his fist, because he laughed at his mourning the death of Penthesilea. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 13, v. 15.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Homer. Il. 2, v. 212, &c.

THESEIS, a poem written by Codrus, containing an account of the life and actions of Theseus, and now lost. Juv. 1, v. 2.

THESEUS, king of Athens, and son of Ægeus, by Æthra the daughter of Pittheus, was one of the most celebrated of the heroes of antiquity. He was educated at Trœzene in the house of Pittheus, and as he was not publicly acknowledged to be the son of the king of Athens, he passed for the son of Neptune. When he came to years of maturity, he was sent by his mother to his father, and a sword was given to him, by which he might make himself known to Ægeus in a private manner. Vid. Ægeus. His journey to Athens was not across the sea, as it was usual with travellers, but Theseus determined to signalize himself in going by land and encountering difficulties. The road which led from Trœzene to Athens was infested with robbers and wild beasts, and rendered impassable; but these obstacles were easily removed by the courageous son of Ægeus. At Athens, however, his reception was not cordial; Medea lived there with Ægeus, and as she knew that her influence would fall to the ground if Theseus was received in his father's house, she attempted to destroy him before his arrival was made public. Ægeus was himself to give the cup of poison to this unknown stranger at a feast, but the sight of his sword on the side of Theseus reminded him of his amours with Æthra. He knew him to be his son, and the people of Athens were glad to find that this illustrious stranger, who had cleared Attica from robbers and pirates, was the son of their monarch. The Pallantides, who expected to succeed their uncle Ægeus on the throne, as he apparently had no children, attempted to assassinate Theseus, but they fell a prey to their own barbarity, and were all put to death by the young prince. The bull of Marathon next engaged the attention of Theseus. The labour seemed arduous, but he caught the animal alive, and after he had led it through the streets of Athens, he sacrificed it to Minerva, or the god of Delphi. After this, Theseus went to Crete, among the seven chosen youths whom the Athenians yearly sent to be devoured by the Minotaur. The wish to deliver his country from so dreadful a tribute engaged him to undertake this expedition. He was successful by means of Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, who was enamoured of him, and after he had escaped from the labyrinth with a clew of thread, and killed the Minotaur, (Vid Minotaurus,) he sailed from Crete, with the six boys and seven maidens whom his victory had equally redeemed from death. In the island of Naxos, where he was driven by the winds, he had the meanness to abandon Ariadne, to whom he was indebted for his safety. The rejoicings which his return might have occasioned at Athens, were interrupted by the death of Ægeus, who threw himself into the sea when he saw his son's ship return with black sails, which was the signal of ill success. Vid. Ægeus. His ascension on his father's throne was universally applauded, B. C. 1235. The Athenians were governed with mildness, and Theseus made new regulations and enacted new laws. The number of the inhabitants of Athens was increased by the liberality of the monarch, religious worship was attended with more than usual solemnity, a court was instituted which had the care of all civil affairs, and Theseus made the government democratical, while he reserved for himself only the command of the armies. The fame which he had gained by his victories and policy, made his alliance courted; but Pirithous, king of the Lapithæ, alone wished to gain his friendship, by meeting him in the field of battle. He invaded the territories of Attica, and when Theseus had marched out to meet him, the two enemies, struck at the sight of each other, rushed between their two armies to embrace one another in the most cordial and affectionate manner, and from that time began the most sincere and admired friendship, which has become proverbial. Theseus was present at the nuptials of his friend, and was the most eager and courageous of the Lapithæ in the defence of Hippodamia and her female attendants against the brutal attempts of the Centaurs. When Pirithous had lost Hippodamia, he agreed with Theseus, whose wife Phædra was also dead, to carry away some of the daughters of the gods. Their first attempt was upon Helen, the daughter of Leda, and after they had obtained this beautiful prize, they cast lots, and she became the property of Theseus. The Athenian monarch intrusted her to the care of his mother Æthra, at Aphidnæ, till she was of nubile years; but the resentment of Castor and Pollux soon obliged him to restore her safe into their hands. Helen, before she reached Sparta, became mother of a daughter by Theseus; but this tradition, confirmed by some ancient mythologists, is confuted by others, who affirm, that she was but nine years old when carried away by the two royal friends, and Ovid introduces her in one of his epistles, saying, Excepto redii tzssa timore nihil. Some time after, Theseus assisted his friend in procuring a wife, and they both descended into the infernal regions to carry away Proserpine. Pluto, apprised of their intentions, stopped them. Pirithous was placed on his father's wheel, and Theseus was tied to a huge stone, on which he had set to rest himself. Virgil represents him in this eternal state of punishment, repeating to the shades in Tartarus the words of Discite justitiam moniti, et non temnere divos. Apollodorus, however, and others declare, that he was not long detained in hell; when Hercules came to steal the dog Cerberus, he tore him away from the stone, but with such violence that his skin was left behind. The same assistance was given to Pirithous, and the two friends returned upon the earth by the favour of Hercules, and the consent of the infernal deities, not, however, without suffering the most excruciating torments. During the captivity of Theseus in the kingdom of Pluto, Mnestheus, one of the descendants of Erechtheus, ingratiated himself into the favour of the people of Athens, and obtained the crown in preference to the children of the absent monarch. At his return, Theseus attempted to eject the usurper, but to no purpose. The Athenians had forgotten his many services, and he retired with great mortification to the court of Lycomedes, king of the island of Scyrus. After paying him much attention, Lycomedes, either jealous of his fame, or bribed by the presents of Mnestheus, carried him to a high rock, on pretence of showing him the extent of his dominions, and threw him down a deep precipice. Some suppose that Theseus inadvertently fell down this precipice, and that he was crushed to death without receiving any violence from Lycomedes. The children of Theseus, after the death of Mnestheus, recovered the Athenian throne, and that the memory of their father might not be without the honours due to a hero, they brought his remains from Scyros, and gave them a magnificent burial. They also raised him statues and a temple, and festivals and games were publicly instituted to commemorate the actions of a hero who had rendered such services to the people of Athens. These festivals were still celebrated, with original solemnity, in the age of Pausanias and Plutarch, about 1200 years after the death of Theseus. The historians disagree from the poets in their accounts about this hero, and they all suppose, that, instead of attempting to carry away the wife of Pluto, the two friends wished to seduce a daughter of Aidoneus, king of the Molossi.—This daughter, as they say, bore the name of Proserpine, and the dog which kept the gates of the palace, was called Cerberus, and hence, perhaps, arises the fiction of the poets. Pirithous was torn to pieces by the dog, but Theseus was confined in prison, from whence he made his escape, some time after, by the assistance of Hercules. Some authors place Theseus and his friend in the number of the Argonauts, but they were both detained, either in the infernal regions, or in the country of the Molossi, in the time of Jason's expedition to Colchis. Plut. in vitâ.—Apollod. 3.—Hygin. fab. 14 and 79.—Paus. 1. c. 2, &c.—*Ovid. THESMOPHŎRA, a surname of Ceres, as lawgiver, in whose honour festivals were instituted called Thesmophoria. The Thesmophoria were instituted by Triptolemus, or, according to some, by Orphus or the daughters of Danaus. The greatest part of the Grecian cities, especially Athens, observed them with great solemnity. The worshippers were freeborn women, whose husbands were obliged to defray the expenses of the festival. They were assisted by a priest, called στεφανηφορος, because he carried a crown on his head. There were also certain virgins who officiated, and were maintained at the public expense. The freeborn women were dressed in white robes to intimate their spotless innocence; they were charged to observe the strictest chastity during three or five days before the celebration, and during the four days of the solemnity; and on that account it was usual for them to strew their bed with agnus castus. They were also charged not to eat pomegranates, or to wear garlands on their heads, as the whole was to be observed with the greatest signs of seriousness and gravity, without any display of wantonness or levity. It was, however, usual to jest at one another, as the goddess Ceres had been made to smile by a merry expression when she was sad and melancholy for the recent loss of her daughter Proserpine. Three days were required for the preparation, and upon the 11th of the month called Pyanepsion, the women went to Eleusis, carrying books on their heads, in which the laws which the goddess had invented were contained. On the 14th of the same month the festival began, on the 16th day a fast was observed, and the women sat on the ground in token of humiliation. It was usual during the festival to offer prayers to Ceres, Proserpine, Pluto, and Calligenia, whom some suppose to be the nurse or favourite maid of the goddess of corn, or perhaps one of her surnames. There were some sacrifices of a mysterious nature, and all persons whose offence was small were released from confinement. Such as were initiated at the festivals of Eleusis assisted at the Thesmophoria. The place of highpriest was hereditary in the family of Eumolpus. *Ovid. THESMOTHĔTÆ, a name given to the last six archons among the Athenians, because they took particular care to enforce the laws, and to see justice impartially administered. They were at that time nine in number.

THESPIS, a Greek poet of Attica, supposed by some to be the inventor of tragedy, 536 years before Christ. His representations were very rustic and imperfect. He went from town to town upon a cart, on which was erected a temporary stage, where two actors, whose faces were daubed with the lees of wine, entertained the audience with choral songs, &c. Solon was a great enemy to his dramatic representations. Horat. Art. P. 276.—Diog.

THESPIUS. Vid. Part III.

THEUTIS, or TEUTHIS, a prince of a town of the same name in Arcadia, who went to the Trojan war. He quarrelled with Agamemnon at Aulis, and when Minerva, under the form of Melas, son of Ops, attempted to pacify him, he struck the goddess and returned home. Some say that the goddess afterwards appeared to him and showed him the wound which he had given her in the thigh, and that he died soon after. Paus. 8, c. 28.

THIMBRON, a Lacedæmonian general, chosen to conduct a war against Persia. He was recalled, and afterwards reappointed. He died B. C. 391. Diod. 17.

THOAS. Vid. Part III.

THOMYRIS, called also Tamyris, Tameris, Thamyris, and Tomeris, was queen of the Massagetæ. After her husband's death she marched against Cyrus, who wished to invade her territories, cut his army to pieces, and killed him on the spot. The barbarous queen ordered the head of the fallen monarch to be cut off and thrown into a vessel full of human blood, with the insulting words of satia te sanguine quem sitisti. Her son had been conquered by Cyrus before she marched herself at the head of her armies. Herodot. 1, c. 205.—Justin. 1, c. 8. Tibull, 4 el. 1, v. 143.

THORIA LEX, agraria, by Sp. Thorius, the tribune. It ordained that no person should pay any rent for the land which he possessed. It also made some regulations about grazing and pastures. Cic. in Brut.

THRASIDEUS, succeeded his father Theron as tyrant of Agrigentum. He was conquered by Hiero, and soon after put to death. Died. 11.

THRASO, a favourite of Hieronymus, who espoused the interest of the Romans. He was put to death by the tyrant.——The character of a captain in Terence.

THRASYBŪLUS, a famous general of Athens, who began the expulsion of the 30 tyrants of his country, though he was only assisted by 30 of his friends. His efforts were attended with success, B. C. 401, and the only reward he received for this patriotic action, was a crown made with two twigs of an olive branch; a proof of his own disinterestedness and of the virtues of his countrymen. The Athenians employed a man whose abilities and humanity were so conspicuous, and Thrasybulus was sent with a powerful fleet to recover their lost power in the Ægean, and on the coast of Asia. After he had gained many advantages, this great man was killed in his camp by the inhabitants of Aspendus, whom his soldiers had plundered without his knowledge, B. C. 391. Diod. 14.—*C. Thūcȳdides, I. a celebrated Greek historian, born at Athens. His father's name was Olorus, and among his ancestors he reckoned the great Miltiades. His youth was distinguished by an eager desire to excel in the vigorous exercises and gymnastic amusements, which called the attention of his contemporaries, and when he had reached the years of manhood, he appeared in the Athenian armies. During the Peloponnesian war he was commissioned by his countrymen to relieve Amphipolis; but the quick march of Brasidas, the Lacedæmonian general, defeated his operations; and Thucydides, unsuccessful in his expedition, was banished from Athens. This happened in the eighth year of this celebrated war, and in the place of his banishment the general began to write an impartial history of the important events which had happened during his administration, and which still continued to agitate the several states of Greece. This famous history is continued only to the 21st year of the war, and the remaining part of the time till the demolition of the walls of Athens, was described by the pen of Theopompus and Xenophon. Thucydides wrote in the Attic dialect, as possessed of more vigour, purity, elegance, and energy. He spared neither time nor money to procure authentic materials; and the Athenians, as well as their enemies, furnished him with many valuable communications, which contributed to throw great light on the different transactions of the war. His history has been divided into eight books, the last of which is imperfect, and supposed to have been written by his daughter. The character of this interesting history is well known, and the noble emulation of the writer will ever be admired, who shed tears when he heard Herodotus repeat his history of the Persian wars at the public festivals of Greece. The historian of Halicarnassus has been compared with the son of Olorus, but each has his peculiar excellence. Sweetness of style, grace, and elegance of expression, may be called the characteristics of the former; while Thucydides stands unequalled for the fire of his descriptions, the conciseness, and, at the same time, the strong and energetic matter of his narratives. His relations are authentic, as he himself was interested in the events he mentions; his impartiality indubitable, as he nowhere betrays the least resentment against his countrymen, and the factious partisans of Cleon, who had banished him from Athens. Many have blamed the historian for the injudicious distribution of his subject, and while, for the sake of accuracy, the whole is divided into summers and winters, the thread of the history is interrupted, the scene continually shifted; and the reader, unable to pursue events to the end, is transported from Persia to Peloponnesus, or from the walls of Syracuse to the coast of Corcyra. The animated harangues of Thucydides have been universally admired; he found a model in Herodotus, but he greatly surpassed the original; and succeeding historians have adopted with success, a peculiar mode of writing which introduces a general addressing himself to the passions and feelings of his armies. The history of Thucydides was so admired, that Demosthenes, to perfect himself as an orator, transcribed it eight different times, and read it with such attention, that he could almost repeat it by heart. Thucydides died at Athens, where he had been recalled from his exile, in his 80th year, 391 years before Christ. The best editions of Thucydides are those of Duker, fol. Amst. 1731; of Glasgow, 12mo. 8 vols. 1759; of Hudson, fol. Oxon. 1696; and the 8vo. of Bipont. 1788. Cic. de Orat. &c.—Diod. 12.—Dionys. Hal. de Thuc.—*Ælian. V. Thyestes, a son of Pelops and Hippodamia, and grandson of Tantalus, offered violence to Ærope, the wife of his brother Atreus, because he refused to take him as his colleague on the throne of Argos. This was no sooner known than Atreus divorced Ærope, and banished Thyestes from his kingdom; but soon after, the more effectually to punish his infidelity, he expressed a wish to be reconciled to him, and recalled him to Argos. Thyestes was received by his brother at an elegant entertainment, but he was soon informed that he had been feeding upon the flesh of one of his own children. This Atreus took care to communicate to him by showing him the remains of his son's body. This action appeared so barbarous, that, according to the ancient mythologists, the sun changed his usual course not to be spectator of so bloody a scene. Thyestes escaped from his brother, and fled to Epirus. Some time after, he met his daughter Pelopeia in a grove sacred to Minerva, and he offered her violence without knowing who she was. This incest, however, according to some, was intentionally committed by the father, as he had been told by an oracle that the injuries he had received from Atreus would be avenged by a son born from himself and Pelopeia. The daughter, pregnant by her father, was seen by her uncle Atreus and married, and some time after she brought into the world a son, whom she exposed in the woods. The life of the child was preserved by goats; he was called Ægysthus, and presented to his mother, and educated in the family of Atreus. When grown to years of maturity, the mother gave her son Ægysthus a sword, which she had taken from her unknown ravisher in the grove of Minerva, with hopes of discovering who he was. Meantime, Atreus, intent to punish his brother, sent Agamemnon and Menelaus to pursue him, and when at last they found him, he was dragged to Argos, and thrown into a close prison. Ægysthus was sent to murder Thyestes, but the father recollected the sword which was raised to stab him, and a few questions convinced him that his assassin was his own son. Pelopeia was present at this discovery, and when she found that she had committed incest with her father, she asked Ægysthus to let her examine the sword, and immediately plunged it into her own breast. Ægysthus rushed from the prison to Atreus, with the bloody weapon, and murdered him near an altar, as he wished to offer thanks to the gods on the supposed death of Thyestes. At the death of Atreus, Thyestes was placed on his brother's throne by Ægysthus, from which he was soon after driven by Agamemnon and Menelaus. He retired from Argos, and was banished into the island of Cythera by Agamemnon, where he died. Apollod. 2, c. 4. Sophocl. in Ajax.—Hygin. fab. 86, &c.—Ovid. in H. 359.—Lucan. 1, v. 544, l. 7, v. 451.—Senec. in Thyest.

Tiberius, I. (Claudius Drusus Nero,) a Roman emperor after the death of Augustus, descended from the family of the Claudii. In his early years he commanded popularity by entertaining the populace with magnificent shows and fights of gladiators, and he gained some applause in the funeral oration which he pronounced over his father, though only nine years old. His first appearance in the Roman armies was under Augustus, in the war against the Cantabri, and afterwards, in the capacity of general, he obtained victories in different parts of the empire, and was rewarded with a triumph. Yet, in the midst of his glory, Tiberius fell under the displeasure of Augustus, and retired to Rhodes, where he continued for seven years as an exile, till by the influence of his mother Livia with the emperor, he was recalled. His return to Rome was the most glorious; he had the command of the Roman armies in Illyricum, Pannonia, and Dalmatia, and seemed to divide the sovereign power with Augustus. At the death of the celebrated emperor, Tiberius, who had been adopted, assumed the reins of government; and while with dissimulation and affected modesty he wished to decline the dangerous office, he found time to try the fidelity of his friends, and to make the greatest part of the Romans believe that he was invested with the purple, not from his own choice, but by the recommendation of Augustus and the urgent entreaties of the Roman senate. The beginning of his reign seemed to promise tranquillity to the world; Tiberius was a watchful guardian of the public peace, he was the friend of justice, and never assumed the sounding titles which must disgust a free nation; but he was satisfied to say of himself that he was the master of his slaves, the general of his soldiers, and the father of the citizens of Rome. That seeming moderation, however, which was but the fruit of the deepest policy, soon disappeared, and Tiberius was viewed in his real character. His ingratitude to his mother Livia, to whose intrigues he was indebted for the purple, his cruelty to his wife Julia, and his tyrannical oppression and murder of many noble senators, rendered him odious to the people, and suspected even by his most intimate favourites. The armies mutinied in Pannonia and Germany, but the tumults were silenced by the prudence of the generals and the fidelity of the officers, and the factious demagogues were abandoned to punishment. This acted as a check upon Tiberius in Rome; he knew from thence, as his successors experienced, that his power was precarious, and his very existence in perpetual danger. He continued, as he had begun, to pay the greatest deference to the senate; all libels against him he disregarded, and observed, that in a free city the thoughts and the tongue of every man should be free. The taxes were gradually lessened, and luxury restrained by the salutary regulations, as well as by the prevailing example and frugality of the emperor. While Rome exhibited a scene of peace and public tranquillity, the barbarians were severally defeated on the borders of the empire, and Tiberius gained new honours by the activity and valour of Germanicus and his other faithful lieutenants. Yet the triumphs of Germanicus were beheld with jealousy. Tiberius dreaded his power, he was envious of his popularity, and the death of that celebrated general in Antioch was, as some suppose, accelerated by poison and the secret resentment of the emperor. Not only his relations and friends, but the great and opulent were sacrificed to his ambition, cruelty, and avarice; and there was scarce in Rome one single family that did not reproach Tiberius for the loss of a brother, a father, or a husband. He at last retired to the island of Capreæ, on the coast of Campania, where he buried himself in unlawful pleasures. The care of the empire was intrusted to favourites, among whom Sejanus for a while shone with uncommon splendour. In his solitary retreat the emperor proposed rewards to such as invented new pleasures, or could produce fresh luxuries. He forgot his age as well as his dignity, and disgraced himself by the most unnatural vices and enormous indulgences which can draw a blush, even on the countenance of the most debauched and abandoned. While the emperor was lost to himself and the world, the provinces were harassed on every side by the barbarians, and Tiberius found himself insulted by those enemies whom hitherto he had seen fall prostrate at his feet with every mark of submissive adulation. At last, grown weak and helpless through infirmities, he thought of his approaching dissolution; and as he well knew that Rome could not exist without a head, he nominated as his successor Caius Caligula. Many might inquire why a youth naturally so vicious and abandoned as Caius was chosen to be the master of an extensive empire; but Tiberius wished his own cruelties to be forgotten in the barbarities which might be displayed in the reign of his successor, whose natural propensities he had well defined, in saying of Caligula, that he bred a serpent for the Roman people, and a Phaeton for the rest of the empire. Tiberius died at Misenum, the 16th of March, A. D. 37, in the 78th year of his age, after a reign of 22 years, 6 months, and 26 days.

Caligula was accused of having hastened his end by suffocating him. The joy was universal when his death was known; and the people of Rome, in the midst of sorrow, had a moment to rejoice, heedless of the calamities which awaited them in the succeeding reigns. The body of Tiberius was conveyed to Rome, and burnt with great solemnity. A funeral oration was pronounced by Caligula, who seemed to forget his benefactor while he expatiated on the praises of Augustus, Germanicus, and his own. The character of Tiberius has been examined with particular attention by historians, and his reign is the subject of the most perfect and elegant of all the compositions of Tacitus. When a private man, Tiberius was universally esteemed; when he had no superior, he was proud, arrogant, jealous, and revengeful. If he found his military operations conducted by a warlike general, he affected moderation and virtue; but when he got rid of the powerful influence of a favourite, he was tyrannical and dissolute. If, as some observed, he had lived in the times of the Roman republic, he might have been as conspicuous as his great ancestors; but the sovereign power lodged in his hand rendered him vicious and oppressive. Yet, though he encouraged informers and favoured flattery, he blushed at the mean servilities of the senate, and derided the adulation of his courtiers, who approached him, he said, as if they approached a savage elephant. He was a patron of learning, he was an eloquent and ready speaker, and dedicated some part of his time to study. He wrote a lyric poem, entitled, A Complaint on the Death of Lucius Cæsar, as also some Greek pieces, in imitation of some of his favourite authors. He avoided all improper expressions, and all foreign words he totally wished to banish from the Latin tongue. As instances of his humanity, it has been recorded that he was uncommonly liberal to the people of Asia Minor, whose habitations had been destroyed by a violent earthquake, A. D. 17. One of his officers wished him to increase the taxes, No, said Tiberius, a good shepherd must shear, not flay his sheep. The senators wished to call the month of November, in which he was born, by his name, in imitation of J. Cæsar and Augustus, in the months of July and August; but this he refused, saying, What will you do, conscript fathers, if you have thirteen Cæsars? Like the rest of the emperors, he received divine honours after death, and even during his life. It has been wittily observed by Seneca, that he never was intoxicated but once all his life, for he continued in a perpetual state of intoxication from the time he gave himself to drinking till the last moment of his life. *Sueton. in vitâ, &c. — Tacit. Tibullus, Aulus Albius, is the earliest and most admired of the Roman elegiac poets. His birth may be conjectured to have occurred between the years 695 and 700. It has often been remarked, that few of the great Latin poets, orators, or historians, were born at Rome, and that, if the capital had always confined the distinction of Romans to the ancient families within the walls, her name would have been deprived of some of its noblest ornaments. Tibullus, however, is one of the exceptions, as his birth, in whatever year it may have happened, unquestionably took place in the capital. He was descended of an equestrian family, of considerable wealth and possessions, though little known or mentioned in the history of their country. His father had been engaged on the side of Pompey in the civil wars, and died soon after Cæsar had finally triumphed over the liberties of Rome. It is said, but without any sufficient authority, that Tibullus himself was present at Philippi along with his friend Messala, in the ranks of the republican army. He retired in early life to his paternal villa near Pedum, (now Zagarola,) a town in the ancient Latian territory, and only a few miles distant from Prænestе. In his youth he had tasted the sweets of affluence and fortune, but the ample patrimony which he inherited from his ancestors, was greatly diminished by the partitions of land made to the soldiers of the triumvirs. Dacier and other French critics have alleged, that he was ruined by his own dissipation and extravagance, which has been denied by Vulpius and Broukhusius, the learned editors and commentators of Tibullus, with the same eagerness as if their own fame and fortune had depended on the question. The partition of the lands in Italy was probably the chief cause of his indigence; but we think it not unlikely, that his own extravagance may have contributed to his early difficulties. He utters his complaints of the venality of his mistresses and favourites in terms which show that he had already suffered from their rapacity. Nevertheless, he expresses himself as if prepared to part with every thing to gratify their cupidity. It seems probable, that no part of the land, of which Tibullus had been deprived, was restored to him, as we find not in his elegies a single expression of gratitude or compliment, from which it might be conjectured that Augustus had atoned to him for the wrongs of Octavius. It is evident, however, that he was not reduced to extreme want. Tibullus himself complains indeed of poverty, but the poverty of the Latin poets is pretty well defined by Broukhusius, "Fortuna mediocris cui nihil deest," and nearly the same notion of it is communicated to us by Tibullus in his first elegy. It might even be inferred from a distich in a subsequent elegy, that his chief paternal seat had been preserved to him; and Horace, in a complimentary epistle, written long after the partition of the lands, says, that the gods had bestowed on him wealth, and the art of enjoying it. His friendship for Messala, and perhaps some hope of improving his moderate and diminished fortune, induced him to attend that celebrated commander in various military expeditions. It would appear that he had accom panied him in not less than three. Messala, being intrusted by the emperor with an extraordinary command in the East, requested Tibullus to accompany him, and to this proposal our poet, though it would appear with some reluctance, at length consented. He had not, however, been long at sea, when his health suffered so severely, that he was obliged to be put on shore at an island, which Tibullus names by its poetical appellation of Phæacia, but which was then commonly called Corcyra, (now Corfu.) He recovered from this dangerous sickness, and as soon as he was able to renew his voyage, he joined Messala, and travelled with him through Syria, Cilicia, and Egypt. Having returned to Italy, he again retired to his farm at Pedum, where, though he occasionally visited the capital, he chiefly resided during the remainder of his life. Tibullus was endued with elegant manners, and a handsome person, which often procured him the love, though they could not always secure the constancy, of the fair. With Delia, he seems to have been at one time successful, but she forsook him for a husband or a more favoured lover; and his fortune does not appear to have been sufficient to obtain for him the good graces of the rapacious Nemesis. While he thus bowed at the shrine of beauty, he at the same time drew closer his connexion with the most learned and polite of his countrymen, as Valgius, Macer, and Horace. Tibullus' enjoyment of this sort of life was considerably impaired by the state of his health, which had continued to be delicate ever since the illness with which he was attacked at Corcyra. His existence was protracted till 734, and his death, which happened in that year, was deplored by Ovid in a long elegiac poem. The events and circumstances of the life of Tibullus have exercised a remarkable influence on his writings. Those occurrences to which he was exposed tended to give a peculiar turn to his thoughts, and a peculiar colouring to his language. He fell on the evil days of his country. The Roman fair of the highest rank had become alike licentious and venal; and the property of those ancient possessors of the Italian soil, who had adhered to the republican party, was divided by unprincipled usurpers among their rapacious soldiery. Unhappy in love, and less prosperous in fortune, than in early youth he had reason to anticipate, all that he utters on these topics is stamped with such reality, that no reader can suspect for a moment, either that his complaints were borrowed from Greek sources, or were the mere creations of fancy. His inability to procure either the advantages of fortune or delights of contentment, is the source of constant struggle and disappointment. Hence the irritability, melancholy, and changeableness of his temper. Such circumstances in the life, and such features in the character, of Tibullus, will, we think, be found explanatory and illustrative of much which we find in his elegies. These elegies have been divided by German writers into Erotic, Rural, Devotional, and Panegyrical. The compositions evidently most adapted to the genius of Tibullus, are poems not merely written in elegiac verse, but which answer to our understanding of the word Elegy, in the subject and sentiments. The tone of complaint best accords with his soul. Like the nightingale, his most mournful notes are his sweetest, and melancholy feelings are those which he expresses most frequently, as well as with most truth and beauty. His first composition was to celebrate the virtues of his friend Messala, but his more favourite study was writing love verses in praise of his mistresses Delia and Plautia, of Nemesis and Neæra; and in these elegant effusions he showed himself the most correct of the Roman poets. As he had espoused the cause of Brutus, he lost his possessions when the soldiers of the triumvirate were rewarded with lands; but he might have recovered them if he had condescended, like Virgil, to make his court to Augustus. Four books of elegies are the only remaining pieces of his composition. They are uncommonly elegant and beautiful, and possessed with so much grace and purity of sentiment, that the writer is deservedly ranked as the prince of elegiac poets. Tibullus was intimate with the literary men of his age, and he for some time had a poetical contest with Horace, in gaining the favours of an admired courtesan. Ovid has written a beautiful elegy on the death of his friend. The poems of Tibullus are generally published with those of Propertius and Catullus, of which the best editions are, that of Vulpius, Petavii, 1737, 1749, 1755; that of Barbou, 12 mo. Paris, 1754; and that by Heyne, 8vo. Lips. 1776. Ovid. 3, Am. el. 9, Trist. 2, v. 447.—Horat. 1, ep. 4, l. 1, od. 33, v. 1.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.

Ticĭna, a Roman poet a few years before the age of Cicero, who wrote epigrams, and praised his mistress Metella under the fictitious name of Perilla. Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 433.

Tigellĭnus, a Roman celebrated for his intrigues and perfidy in the court of Nero. He was appointed judge at the trial of the conspirators who had leagued against Nero, for which he was liberally rewarded with triumphal honours. He afterwards betrayed the emperor, and was ordered to destroy himself, 68 A. D. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 72.—Plut.—Juv. 1.

Tigrānes, I. a king of Armenia, who made himself master of Assyria and Cappadocia. He married Cleopatra, the daughter of Mithridates, and by the advice of his father-in-law, he declared war against the Romans. He despised these distant enemies, and even ordered the head of the messenger to be cut off who first told him that the Roman general was boldly advancing towards his capital. His pride, however, was soon abated, and though he ordered the Roman consul Lucullus to be brought alive into his presence, he fled with precipitation from his capital, and was soon after defeated near mount Taurus. This totally disheartened him, he refused to receive Mithridates into his palace, and even set a price upon his head. His mean submission to Pompey, the successor of Lucullus in Asia, and a bribe of 60,000 talents, insured him on his throne, and he received a garrison in his capital, and continued at peace with the Romans. His second son of the same name revolted against him, and attempted to dethrone him with the assistance of the king of Parthia, whose daughter he had married. This did not succeed, and the son had recourse to the Romans, by whom he was put in possession of Sophene, while the father remained quiet on the throne of Armenia. The son was afterwards sent in chains to Rome for his insolence to Pompey. Cic. pro Man.—*Val. TIMEA, the wife of Agis, king of Sparta, was debauched by Alcibiades, by whom she had a son. This child was rejected in the succession to the throne, though Agis on his deathbed, declared him to be legitimate. Plut. in Ag.

TIMÆUS, I. a friend of Alexander, who came to his assistance when he was alone surrounded by the Oxydracæ. He was killed in the encounter. Curt. 9, c. 5.——II. An historian of Sicily, who flourished about 262 B. C. and died in the 96th year of his age. His father's name was Andromachus. He was banished from Sicily by Agathocles. His general history of Sicily, and that of the wars of Pyrrhus, were in general esteem, and his authority was great, except when he treated of Agathocles. All his compositions are lost. Plut. in. Nic.—Cic. de Orat.—Diod. 5.—C. Nep.——III. A writer who published some treatises concerning ancient philosophers. Diog. in Emp.——IV. A Pythagorean philosopher, born at Locris. He followed the doctrines of the founder of the metempsychosis, but in some parts of his system of the world he differed from him. He wrote a treatise on the nature and the soul of the world, in the Doric dialect, still extant. Plato in Tim.—Plut.

TIMAGORAS, an Athenian, capitally punished for paying homage to Darius, according to the Persian manner of kneeling on the ground, when he was sent to Persia as ambassador. Val. Max. 6, c. 3.—Suidas.

TIMANTHES, a painter of Sicyon, in the reign of Philip, the father of Alexander the Great. In his celebrated painting of Iphigenia going to be immolated, he represented all the attendants overwhelmed with grief; but his superior genius, by covering the face of Agamemnon, left to the conception of the imagination the deep sorrows of the father. He obtained a prize, for which the celebrated Parrhasius was a competitor. This was in painting an Ajax with all the fury which his disappointments could occasion when deprived of the arms of Achilles. Cic. de Orat.—Val. Max. 8, c. 11.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 11.

TIMARCHUS, I. a philosopher of Alexandria, intimate with Lamprocles, the disciple of Socrates. Diog.——II. A rhetorician, who hung himself when accused of licentiousness by Æschines.——III. An officer in Ætolia, who burnt his ships to prevent the flight of his companions, and to insure himself the victory. Polyæn. 5.

TIMASITHEUS, a prince of Lipara, who obliged a number of pirates to spare some Romans, who were going to make an offering of the spoils of Veii to the god of Delphi. The Roman senate rewarded him very liberally, and 137 years after, when the Carthaginians were dispossessed of Lipari, the same generosity was nobly extended to his descendants in the island. Diod. 14.—Plut. in Cam.

TIMESIUS, a native of Clazomenæ, who began to build Abdera. He was prevented by the Thracians, but honoured as a hero at Abdera. Herodot. 1, c. 168.

TIMOCLEA, a Theban lady, sister to Theagenes, who was killed at Cheronæa. One of Alexander's soldiers offered her violence, after which she led her ravisher to a well, and while he believed that immense treasures were concealed there, Timoclea threw him into it. Alexander commended her virtue, and forbade his soldiers to hurt the Theban females. Plut. in Alex.

TIMOCLES, was one of the earlier poets of the new comedy. He was the contemporary of Demosthenes, whom he attacks in a fragment of the Ἥρωες, for a disinclination to peace; and in another, the Δήλος, he accuses him of receiving bribes from Harpalus, the unfaithful treasurer of Alexander.

TIMOCRATES, I. a Greek philosopher of uncommon austerity.——II. A Syracusan, who married Arete when Dion had been banished into Greece, by Dionysius. He commanded the forces of the tyrant.

TIMOCREON, a comic poet of Rhodes, who obtained poetical, as well as gymnastic prizes at Olympia. He lived about 476 years before Christ, distinguished for his voracity, and also for his resentment against Simonides and Themistocles. The following epitaph was written on his grave:—

Multa bibens, et multa vorans, mala dinique dicens Multis, hic jaceo Timocreon Rhodius.

TIMOLEON, a celebrated Corinthian, son of Timodemus and Demariste. He was such an enemy to tyranny, that he did not hesitate to murder his own brother Timophanes when he attempted, against his representations, to make himself absolute in Corinth. This was viewed with pleasure by the friends of liberty; but the mother of Timoleon conceived the most inveterate aversion for her son, and for ever banished him from her sight. This proved painful to Timoleon; a settled melancholy dwelt upon his mind, and he refused to accept of any offices in the state. When the Syracusans, oppressed with the tyranny of Dionysius the younger, and of the Carthaginians, had solicited the assistance of the Corinthians, all looked upon Timoleon as a proper deliverer; but all applications would have been disregarded, if one of the magistrates had not awakened in him the sense of natural liberty. Timoleon, says he, if you accept of the command of this expedition, we will believe that you have killed a tyrant; but if not, we cannot but call you your brother's murderer. This had due effect, and Timoleon sailed for Syracuse with ten ships, accompanied by about 1000 men. The Carthaginians attempted to oppose him, but Timoleon eluded their vigilance. Icetas, who had the possession of the city, was defeated, and Dionysius, who despaired of success, gave himelf up into the hands of the Corinthian general. This success gained Timoleon adherents in Sicily, many cities, which hitherto had looked upon him as an impostor, claimed his protection, and when he was at last master of Syracuse by the total overthrow of Icetas and of the Carthaginians, he razed the citadel which had been the seat of tyranny, and erected on the spot a common hall. Syracuse was almost destitute of inhabitants, and at the solicitation of Timoleon, a Corinthian colony was sent to Sicily; the lands were equally divided among the citizens, and the houses were sold for a thousand talents, which were appropriated to the use of the state, and deposited in the treasury. When Syracuse was thus delivered from tyranny, the conqueror extended his benevolence to the other states of Sicily, and all the petty tyrants were reduced and banished from the island. A code of salutary laws was framed for the Syracusans; and the armies of Carthage, which had attempted again to raise commotions in Sicily, were defeated, and peace was at last re-established. The gratitude of the Sicilians was shown every where to their deliverer. Timoleon was received with repeated applause in the public assemblies, and though a private man, unconnected with the government, he continued to enjoy his former influence at Syracuse: his advice was consulted on matters of importance, and his authority respected. He ridiculed the accusations of malevolence, and when some informers had charged him with oppression he rebuked the Syracusans who were going to put the accusers to immediate death. A remarkable instance of his providential escape from the dagger of an assassin has been recorded by one of his biographers. As he was going to offer a sacrifice to the gods after a victory, two assassins, sent by the enemies, approached his person in disguise. The arm of one of the assassins was already lifted up, when he was suddenly stabbed by an unknown person, who made his escape from the camp. The other assassin, struck at the fall of his companion, fell before Timoleon, and confessed, in the presence of the army, the conspiracy that had been formed against his life. The unknown assassin was meantime pursued, and when he was found, he declared that he had committed no crime in avenging the death of a beloved father, whom the man he had stabbed had murdered in the town of Leontini. Inquiries were made, and his confessions were found to be true. Timoleon died at Syracuse, about 337 years before the Christian era. His body received an honourable burial in a public place called from him Timoleonteum; but the tears of a grateful nation were more convincing proofs of the public regret, than the institution of festivals, and games yearly to be observed on the day of his death. *C. Timomăchus, a painter of Byzantium in the age of Sylla and Marius. His paintings of Medea murdering her children, and his Ajax, were purchased for 80 talents by J. Cæsar, and deposited in the temple of Venus at Rome. Plin. 35, c. 11.

Timon, I. a native of Athens, called Misanthrope, for his unconquerable aversion to mankind and all society. He was fond of Apemantus, another Athenian, whose character was similar to his own, and he said that he had some partiality for Alcibiades, because he was one day to be his country's ruin. Once he went into the public assembly, and told his countrymen, that he had a fig-tree on which many had ended their life with a halter, and that as he was going to cut it down to raise a building on the spot, he advised all such as were inclined to destroy themselves, to hasten and go and hang themselves in his garden. Plut. in Alc. &c.—Lucian. in Tim.—Paus. 6, c. 12.——II. A Greek poet, son of Timachus, in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He wrote several dramatic pieces, all now lost, and died in the 90th year of his age. Diog.—Athen. 6 and 13.

Timophănes, a Corinthian, brother to Timoleon. He attempted to make himself tyrant of his country by means of the mercenary soldiers with whom he had fought against the Argives and Cleomenes. Timoleon wished to convince him of the impropriety of his measures, and when he found him unmoved, he caused him to be assassinated. Plut. & C. Nep. in Tim.

Timotheus, I. a poet and musician of Miletus, son of Thersander or Philopolis. He was received with hisses the first time he exhibited as musician in the assembly of the people, and further applications would have totally been abandoned, had not Euripides discovered his abilities, and encouraged him to follow a profession in which he afterwards gained so much applause. He received the immense sum of 1000 pieces of gold from the Ephesians, because he had composed a poem in honour of Diana. He died about the 90th year of his age, two years before the birth of Alexander the Great. There was also another musician of Bœotia in the age of Alexander, often confounded with the musician of Miletus. He was a great favourite of the conqueror of Darius. Cic. de Leg. 2, c. 15.—Paus. 3, c. 12.—Plut. de music. de fort. &c.——II. An Athenian general, son of Conon. He signalized himself by his valour and magnanimity, and showed that he was not inferior to his great father in military prudence. He seized Corcyra, and obtained several victories over the Thebans, but his ill success in one of his expeditions disgusted the Athenians, and Timotheus, like the rest of his noble predecessors, was fined a large sum of money. He retired to Chalcis, where he died. He was so disinterested, that he never appropriated any of the plunder to his own use, but after one of his expeditions he filled the treasury of Athens with 1200 talents. Some of the ancients, to intimate his continual successes, have represented him sleeping by the side of Fortune, while the goddess drove cities into his net. He was intimate with Plato, at whose table he learned temperance and moderation. Athen. 10, c. 3.—Paus. 1, c. 29.—Plut. in Syll. &c.—Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 10 and 18, l. 3, c. 16.—C. Nep.——III. Tiridătes, I. a king of Parthia after the expulsion of Phraates by his subjects. He was soon after deposed, and fled to Augustus in Spain. Horat. 1, Od. 26.——II. A man made king of Parthia by Tiberius, after the death of Phraates, in opposition to Artabanus. Tacit. Ann. 6, &c.——III. A keeper of the royal treasures at Persepolis, who offered to surrender to Alexander the Great. Curt. 5, c. 5, &c.——IV. A king of Armenia in the reign of Nero.

Tiro, (Tullius,) a freedman of Cicero, greatly esteemed by his master for his learning and good qualities. It is said that he invented shorthand writing among the Romans. He wrote the life of Cicero, and other treatises now lost. Cic. ad Att. &c.

Tisamēnes, or Tisamēnus, I. a son of Orestes and Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, who succeeded on the throne of Argos and Lacedæmon. The Heraclidæ entered his kingdom in the third year of his reign, and obliged him to retire with his family into Achaia. He was some time after killed in a battle against the Ionians, near Helice. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Paus. 3, c. 1, l. 7, c. 1.——II. A king of Thebes, son of Thersander and grandson of Polynices. The furies, who continually persecuted the house of Œdipus, permitted him to live in tranquillity, but they tormented his son and successor Autesion, and obliged him to retire to Doris. Paus. 3, c. 5, l. 9, c. 6.

Tisarchus, a friend of Agathocles, by whom he was murdered, &c. Polyæn. 5.

Tissaphernes, a satrap of Persia, commander of the forces of Artaxerxes at the battle of Cunaxa against Cyrus. It was by his valour and intrepidity that the king's forces gained the victory, and for this he obtained the daughter of Artaxerxes in marriage, and all the provinces of which Cyrus was governor. His popularity did not long continue, and the king ordered him to be put to death, when he had been conquered by Agesilaus, 395 B. C. C. Nep.

Tithenidia, a festival of Sparta in which nurses, τιθῆναι, conveyed male infants, intrusted to their charge, to the temple of Diana, where they sacrificed young pigs.

Tithraustes, a Persian satrap, B. C. 395, ordered to murder Tissaphernes by Artaxerxes. He succeeded to the offices which the slaughtered favourite enjoyed. He was defeated by the Athenians under Cimon.——The name was common to some of the superior officers of state in the court of Artaxerxes. Plut.—C. Nep. in Dat. & Conon.

Titia Lex de magistratibus, by P. Titius, he tribune, A. U. C. 710. It ordained that a riumvirate of magistrates should be invested with consular power to preside over the republic for five years. The persons chosen were Octavius, Antony, and Lepidus.——Another, 'e provinciis, which required that the provincial uæstors, like the consuls and prætors, should eceive their provinces by lot.

Titiana Flavia, the wife of the emperor 'ertinax, disgraced herself by her debaucheries nd incontinence. After the murder of her usband she was reduced to poverty, and spent ie rest of her life in an obscure retreat.

Titianus, (Attil.) a noble Roman, put to eath A. D. 156, by the senate, for aspiring to ie purple. He was the only one proscribed ıring the reign of Antoninus Pius.

Titus Vespasianus, son of Vespasian and Flavia Domitilla, because known by his valour in the Roman armies, particularly at the siege of Jerusalem. In the 79th year of the Christian era he was invested with the imperial purple, and the Roman people had every reason to expect in him the barbarities of a Tiberius and the debaucheries of a Nero. While in the house of Vespasian, Titus had been distinguished for his extravagance and incontinence, his attendants were the most abandoned and dissolute, and it seemed that he wished to be superior to the rest of the world in the gratification of every impure desire, and in every unnatural vice. Yet he became a model of virtue, and abandoned his usual profligacy; and Berenice, whom he had loved with uncommon ardour, even to render himself despised by the Roman people, was dismissed from his presence. When raised to the throne he thought himself bound to be the father of his people, the guardian of virtue, and the patron of liberty. All informers were banished from his presence, and even severely punished. A reform was made in the judicial proceedings, and trials were no longer permitted to be postponed for years. To do good to his subjects was the ambition of Titus, and it was at the recollection that he had done no service, or granted no favour one day, that he exclaimed in the memorable words of My friends, I have lost a day! Two of the senators conspired against his life, but the emperor disregarded their attempts, he made them his friends by kindness, and, like another Nerva, presented them with a sword to destroy him. During his reign Rome was three days on fire, the towns of Campania were destroyed by an eruption of Vesuvius, and the empire was visited by a pestilence which carried away an infinite number of inhabitants. In this time of public calamity the emperor's benevolence and philanthropy were conspicuous. Titus comforted the afflicted as a father; he alleviated their distresses by his liberal bounties; and, as if they were but one family, he exerted himself for the good and preservation of the whole. The Romans, however, had not long to enjoy the favours of a magnificent prince. Titus was taken ill, and as he retired into the country of the Sabines to his father's house, his indisposition was increased by a burning fever. He lifted his eyes to heaven, and with modest submission, complained of the severity of fate, which removed him from the world when young, where he had been employed in making a grateful people happy. He died the 13th of September, A. D. 81, in the 41st year of his age, after a reign of two years, two months, and twenty days. After him Domitian ascended the throne, not without incurring the suspicion of having hastened his brother's end by ordering him to be placed, during his agony, in a tub full of snow, where he expired. Domitian has also been accused of raising commotions, and of making attempts to dethrone his brother; but Titus disregarded them, and forgave the offender. Some authors have reflected with severity upon the cruelties which Titus exerzised against the Jews, but though certainly a disgrace to the benevolent features of his character, we must consider him as an instrument in the hands of Providence, exerted for the punishment of a wicked and infatuated people. Joseph. B. J. 7, c. 16, &c.—Suetonius.—Dio. &c.

Titus Tatius, I. a king of the Sabines. Vid. Tatius.——II. Livius, a celebrated historian. Vid. Livius.——III. A son of Junius Brutus, put to death by order of his father, for conspiring to restore the Tarquins.

Tlepolemus, one of Alexander's generals, who obtained Carmania at the general division of the Macedonian empire. Died. 18.

Tolus, a man whose head was found in digging for the foundation of the capitol, in the reign of Tarquin, whence the Romans concluded that their city should become the head or mistress of the world.

Tonea, a solemnity observed at Samos. It was usual to carry Juno's statue to the seashore, and to offer cakes before it, and afterwards to replace it again in the temple. This was in commemoration of the theft of the Tyrrhenians, who attempted to carry away the statue of the goddess, but were detained in the harbour by an invisible force.

Trabea. The plays of Quintus Trabea, supposed to belong chiefly to the class called Togata, are frequently cited by the grammarians, and are mentioned with approbation by Cicero. The name of Trabea was made use of in a well-known deception practised on Joseph Scaliger by Muretus. Scaliger piqued himself on his faculty of distinguishing the characteristic styles of ancient writers. In order to entrap him, Muretus showed him some verses, pretending that he had received them from Germany, where they had been transcribed from an ancient MS. attributed to Q. Trabea. Scaliger was so completely deceived, that he afterwards cited these verses, as lines from the play of Harpace, by Q. Trabea, in the first edition of his Commentary on Varro's Dialogues De Re Rustica, in order to illustrate some obscure expression of his author—"Quis enim," says he, "tam aversus a Musis, tamque humanitatis expers, qui horum publicatione offendatur." Muretus, not content with this malicious trick, afterwards sent him some other verses, to which he affixed the name of Attius, expressing, but more diffusely, the same idea. Scaliger, in his next edition of Varro, published them, along with the former lines, as fragments from the Œnomaus, a tragedy by Attius, and a plagiarism from Trabea—observing at the end of his note, "Fortasse de hoc nimis." Muretus said nothing for two years; but, at the end of that period, he published a volume of his own Latin poems, and, along with them, under the title Affecta Trabeæ, both sets of verses which he had thus palmed on Scaliger for undoubted remnants of antiquity. The whole history of the imposture was fully disclosed in a note: both poems, it was acknowledged, were versions of a fragment, attributed by some to Menander, and by others to Philemon, beginning—Ει τα δακρυα ἡμιν, κ. τ. λ. They have been also translated into Latin by Naugerius.

Trachalus, M. Galerius, a consul in the reign of Nero, celebrated for his eloquence as an orator, and for a majestic and commanding aspect. Quintil.—Tacit.

Trajanus, I. (M. Ulpius Crinitus,) a Roman emperor, born at Italica in Spain. Nerva adopted him as his son, invested him during his lifetime with the imperial purple, and gave him the name of Cæsar and of Germanicus. A little time after Nerva died, and the election of Trajan to the vacant throne was confirmed by the unanimous rejoicings of the people, and the free concurrence of the armies on the confines of Germany and the banks of the Danube. All the actions of Trajan showed a good and benevolent prince, whose virtues truly merited the encomiums which the pen of an elegant and courteous panegyrist has paid. The barbarians continued quiet, and the hostilities which they generally displayed at the election of a new emperor, whose military abilities they distrusted, were not few. Trajan, however, could not behold with satisfaction and unconcern the insolence of the Dacians, who claimed from the Roman people a tribute which the cowardice of Domitian had offered. The sudden appearance of the emperor on the frontiers awed the barbarians to peace, but Decebalus, their warlike monarch, soon began hostilities by violating the treaty. The emperor entered the enemy's country by throwing a bridge across the rapid streams of the Danube, and a battle was fought, in which the slaughter was so great, that in the Roman camp linen was wanted to dress the wounds of the soldiers. Trajan obtained the victory, and Decebalus, despairing of success destroyed himself, and Dacia became a province of Rome. That the ardour of the Roman soldiers in defeating their enemies might not cool, an expedition was undertaken into the East, and Parthia threatened with immediate war. Trajan passed through the submissive kingdom of Armenia, and by his well-directed operations made himself master of the provinces of Assyria and Mesopotamia. The return of the emperor towards Rome was hastened by indisposition, he stopped at Cilicia, and in the town of Selinus, which afterwards was called Trajanopolis, and a few days afterwards expired, in the beginning of August, A. D. 117, after a reign of 19 years, 6 months, and 15 days, in the 64th year of his age. He was succeeded on the throne by Adrian, whom the empress Plotina introduced to the Roman armies as the adopted son of her husband. Trajan was fond of popularity, and he merited it. The sounding titles of Optimus, and the father of his country, were not unworthily bestowed upon a prince who was equal to the greatest generals of antiquity, and who, to indicate his affability, and his wish to listen to the just complaints of his subjects, distinguished his palace by the inscription of the public palace. Like other emperors, he did not receive with an air of unconcern the homage of his friends; but rose from his seat and went cordially to salute them. He refused the statues which the flattery of favourites wished to erect to him, and he ridiculed the follies of an enlightened nation, that could pay adoration to cold inanimate pieces of marble. His public entry into Rome gained him the hearts of the people; he appeared on foot, and showed himself an enemy to parade and an ostentatious equipage. When in his camp, he exposed himself to the fatigues of war like the meanest soldier, and crossed the most barren deserts and extensive plains on foot, and in his dress and food displayed all the simplicity which once gained the approbation of the Romans in their countryman Fabricius. He had a select number of intimates, whom he visited with freedom and openness, and at whose tables he partook many a moderate repast, without form or ceremony. His confidence, however, in the good intentions of others, was, perhaps, carried to excess. His favourite Sura had once been accused of attempts upon his life, but Trajan disregarded the informer, and as he was that same day invited to the house of the supposed conspirator, he went thither early. To try farther the sincerity of Sura, he ordered himself to be shaved by his barber, to have a medicinal application made to his eyes by the hand of his surgeon, and to bathe together with him. The public works of Trajan are also celebrated, he opened free and easy communications between the cities of his provinces, he planted many colonies, and furnished Rome with all the corn and provisions which could prevent a famine in the time of calamity. It was by his directions that the architect Apollodorus built that celebrated column which is still to be seen at Rome under the name of Trajan's column. The area on which it stands was made by the labours of men, and the height of the pillar proves that a large hill 144 feet high was removed at a great expense, A. D. 114, to commemorate the victories of the reigning prince. His persecutions of the Christians were stopped by the interference of the humane Pliny; but he was unusually severe upon the Jews, who had barbarously murdered 200,000 of his subjects, and even fed upon the flesh of the dead. His vices have been obscurely seen, through a reign of continued splendour and popularity, yet he is accused of incontinence and many unnatural indulgences. He was too much addicted to drinking, and his wish to be styled lord has been censured by those who admired the dissimulated moderation and the modest claims of an Augustus. Plin. Paneg. &c.—Dio. Cass.—Eutrop.—Ammian. —Spartian.—Joseph. Bell. J.—Victor.——II. The father of the emperor, who likewise bore the name of Trajan, was honoured with the consulship and a triumph, and the rank of a patrician by the emperor Vespasian.

Trebatius Testa, (C.) a man banished by Julius Cæsar for following the interests of Pompey, and recalled by the eloquence of Cicero. He was afterwards reconciled to Cæsar. Trebatius was not less distinguished for his learning than for his integrity, his military experience and knowledge of law. He wrote nine books on religious ceremonies, and treatises on civil law; and the verses that he composed proved him a poet of no inferior consequence. Horat. 2, Sat. 1, v. 4.

Trebellianus, C. Annius, a pirate who proclaimed himself emperor of Rome A. D. 264. He was defeated and slain in Isauria by the lieutenants of Gallienus.

Trebellienus Rufus, a prætor appointed governor of the children of King Cotys by Tiberius.

Trebellius Pollio, a Latin historian who wrote an account of the lives of the emperors. The beginning of this history is lost; part of the reign of Valerian, and the life of the two Gallieni, with the 30 tyrants, are the only fragments remaining. He flourished A. D. 305.

Trebonia Lex, de provinciis, by L. Trebonius the tribune, A. U. C. 698. It gave Cæsar the chief command in Gaul for five years longer than was enacted by the Vatinian law, and in this manner prevented the senators from recalling or superseding him.——Another, by the same, on the same year, conferred the command of the provinces of Syria and Spain on Cassius and Pompey for five years. Dio. Cass. 39.——Another, by L. Trebonius the tribune, A. U. C. 305, which confirmed the election of the tribunes, in the hands of the Roman people. Liv. 3 and 5.

Trebonius, Caius, one of Cæsar's friends, made, through his interest, prætor and consul. He was afterwards one of his benefactor's murderers. He was killed by Dolabella at Smyrna. Cæs. Bell. 5, c. 17.—Cic. in Phil. 11, c. 2.—Paterc. 56 and 69.—Liv. 119.—Dio. 47.—Horat. 1, Sat. 4, v. 114.

Trierius, (C.) a friend of Pompey. He had for some time the care of the war in Asia against Mithridates, whom he defeated, and by whom he was afterwards beaten. He was killed in the civil wars of Pompey and Cæsar. Cæsar. Bell. Civ. 3, c. 5.

Tribuni Plebis, magistrates at Rome, created in the year U. C. 261, when the people after a quarrel with the senators had retired to mons Sacer. The two first were C. Licinius and L. Albinus, but their number was soon after raised to five, and 37 years after to ten, which remained fixed. Their office was annual, and as the first had been created on the 4th of the ides of December, that day was ever after chosen for the election. Their power, though at first small, and granted by the patricians to appease the momentary seditions of the populace, soon became formidable, and the senators repented too late of having consented to elect magistrates, who not only preserved the rights of the people, but could summon assemblies, propose laws, stop the consultations of the senate, and even abolish their decrees by the word Veto. Their approbation was also necessary to confirm the senatus consulta, and this was done by affixing the letter T. under it. If any irregularity happened in the state, their power was almost absolute; they criticised the conduct of all the public magistrates, and even dragged a consul to prison if the measures he pursued were hostile to the peace of Rome. The dictator alone was their superior, but when that magistrate was elected, the office of tribune was not, like that of all other inferior magistrates, abolished while he continued at the head of the state. The people paid them so much deference, that their person was held sacred, and thence they were always called Sacrosancti. To strike them was a capital crime, and to interrupt them while they spoke in the assemblies, called for the immediate interference of power. The marks by which they were distinguished from other magistrates were not very conspicuous. They wore no particular dress, only a beadle, called viator, marched before them. They never sat in the senate, though, some time after, their office entitled them to the rank of senators. Yet great as their power might appear, they received a heavy wound from their number, and as their consultations and resolutions were of no effect if they were not all unanimous, the senate often took advantage of their avarice, and by gaining one of them by bribes, they, as it were, suspended the authority of the rest. The office of tribune of the people, though at first deemed mean and servile, was afterwards one of the first steps that led to more honourable employments, and as no patrician was permitted to canvass for the tribuneship, we find many that descended among the plebeians to exercise that important office. From the power with which they were at last invested by the activity, the intrigues, and continual applications of those who were in office, they became almost absolute in the state; and it has been properly observed, that they caused far greater troubles than those which they were at first created to silence. Sylla, when raised to the dictatorship, gave a fatal blow to the authority of the tribunes, and by one of his decrees they were no longer permitted to harangue and inflame the people; they could make no laws; no appeal lay to their tribunal, and such as had been tribunes, were not permitted to solicit for the other offices of the state. This disgrace, however, was but momentary; at the death of the tyrant, the tribunes recovered their privileges by means of Cotta and Pompey the Great. The office of tribune remained in full force till the age of Augustus, who, to make himself more absolute, and his person sacred, conferred the power and office upon himself, whence he was called tribunitiâ potestate donatus. His successors on the throne imitated his example, and as the emperor was the real and official tribune, such as were appointed to the office were merely nominal, without power or privilege. Under Constantine the tribuneship was totally abolished. The tribunes were never permitted to sleep out of the city, except at the Feriæ Latinæ, when they went with other magistrates to offer sacrifices upon a mountain near Alba. Their houses were always open, and they received every complaint, and were ever ready to redress the wrongs of their constituents. Their authority was not extended beyond the walls of the city.——There were also other officers who bore the name of tribunes, such as the tribuni militum or militares, who commanded a division of the legions. They were empowered to decide all quarrels that might arise in the army, they took care of the camp, and gave the watch-word. There were only three at first chosen by Romulus, but the number was at last increased to six in every legion. After the expulsion of the Tarquins, they were chosen by the consuls, but afterwards the right of electing them was divided between the people and the consul. They were generally of senatorian and equestrian families, and the former were called laticlavii, and the latter angusticlavii, from their peculiar dress. Those that were chosen by the consuls were called Rutuli, because the right of the consuls to elect them was confirmed by Rutulus; and those elected by the people were called Comitiati, because chosen in the Comitia. They wore a golden ring, and were in office no longer than six months. When the consuls were elected, it was usual to choose 14 tribunes from the knights, who had served five years in the army, and who were called juniores, and ten from the people who had been in ten campaigns, who were called seniores.——There were also some officers called tribuni militum consulari potestate elected instead of consuls, A. U. C. 310. They were only three originally, but the number was afterwards increased to six, or more, according to the will and pleasure of the people and the emergencies of the state. Part of them were plebeians, and the rest of patrician families. When they had subsisted for about 70 years, not without some interruption, the office was totally abolished, as the plebeians were admitted to share the consulship, and the consuls continued at the head of the state till the end of the commonwealth.——The tribuni cohortium prætorianarum were intrusted with the person of the emperor, which they guarded and protected.——The tribuni ærarii were officers chosen from among the people, who kept the money which was to be applied to defray the expenses of the army. The richest persons were always chosen, as much money was requisite for the pay of the soldiers. They were greatly distinguished in the state, and they shared with the senators and Roman knights the privileges of judging. They were abolished by Julius Cæsar, but Augustus re-established them, and created 200 more, to decide causes of smaller importance.——The tribuni celerum had the command of the guard which Romulus chose for the safety of his person. They were 100 in number, distinguished for their probity, their opulence, and their nobility.——The tribuni voluptatum were commissioned to take care of the amusements which were prepared for the people, and that nothing might be wanting in the exhibitions. This office was also honourable.

TRICLARIA, a yearly festival celebrated by the inhabitants of three cities in Ionia, to appease the anger of Diana Triclaria, whose temple had been defiled by Menalippus and Comætho. It was usual to sacrifice a boy and a girl, but this barbarous custom was abolished by Eurypilus. The three cities were Aroe, Messatis, and Anthea, whose united labours had erected the temple of the goddess. Paus. 7, 19.

TRIUMVIRI reipublicæ constituendæ, were three magistrates, appointed equally to govern the Roman state with absolute power. These officers gave a fatal blow to the expiring independence of the Roman people, and became celebrated for their different pursuits, their ambition, and their various fortunes. The first triumvirate, B. C. 60, was in the hands of Julius Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus, who, at the expiration of their office, kindled a civil war. The second and last triumvirate, B. C. 43, was under Augustus, M. Antony, and Lepidus, and through them the Romans totally lost their liberty. The triumvirate was in full force at Rome for the space of about 12 years.—There were also officers who were called triumviri capitales, created A. U. C. 464. They took cognizance of murders and robberies, and every thing in which slaves were concerned. Criminals under sentence of death were intrusted to their care, and they had them executed according to the commands of the prætors.——The triumviri nocturni watched over the safety of Rome in the night time, and in case of fire were ever ready to give orders, and to take the most effectual measures to extinguish it.——The triumviri agrarii had the care of colonies that were sent to settle in different parts of the empire. They made a fair division of the lands among the citizens, and exercised over the new colony all the power which was placed in the hands of the consuls at Rome.——The triumviri monetales were masters of the mint, and had the care of the coin, hence their office was generally intimated by the following letters often seen on ancient coins and medals: IIIVIR. A. A. A. F. F. i. e. triumviri auro, argento, ære flando, feriendo. Some suppose that they were created only in the age of Cicero, as those who were employed before them were called Denariorum flandorum curatores.——The triumviri senatus legendi were appointed to name those that were most worthy to be made senators from among the plebeians. They were first chosen in the age of Augustus, as before this privilege belonged to the kings, and afterwards devolved upon the consuls, and the censors, A. U. C. 310.——The triumviri mensarii were chosen in the second Punic war, to take care of the coin and prices of exchange.

Trogus Pompeius, was born in the country of the Vocontii in Gaul, now Dauphiny. He derived his second name from the great Pompey, who had bestowed on his grandfather the rights of Roman citizenship, in the time of the war with Sertorius. His father, however, deserted the fortunes of the patron of his family, and became a secretary of Julius Cæsar. His work consisted of forty-four books, and was entitled Historiæ Philippicæ, et Totius Mundi Origines, et Terræ Situs. It was called Historia Philippica, because the greater part related to the history of the Macedonian empire, founded by Philip, father of Alexander. But, though this was the principal subject, the author contrived, in the form of episodes or introductions, to connect with it the history of most other nations, from the first king of Assyria to his own time. The book itself has perished, but we possess an abridgment of it by Justin, who lived in the time of the Antonines, and whose epitome was probably the cause of the original work having been neglected and lost. The abbreviator has selected the facts which he conceived would prove most interesting, and had passed over those which he thought could afford neither entertainment nor instruction in the way of example. He has unfortunately omitted a great deal of topographical information, which probably appeared to him little amusing or useful, but which would have been of much interest in modern times, on account of our present imperfect knowledge of ancient geography. Several dissertations have lately been written concerning the sources whence Trogus Pompeius derived the facts of this universal history. Its first six books, which are introductory, and relate to the Assyrians, Persians, and ancient Greeks, previous to the time of Philip, were in a great measure compiled from Herodotus, and Ctesias the Cnidian. The four following books, which contained the life of Philip, were translated from Theopompus of Chios, who wrote a complete history of that monarch. The account of the reign of Alexander has been so much mutilated in the epitome of Justin, that the critics find it almost impossible to discover what authorities have been principally followed. For the wars of Alexander's successors, Trogus chiefly consulted Jerome of Cardia, and Phylarchus. The six books, from the 30th to the 36th, which comprehended the campaigns of the Romans in Greece, against the Achaians and Macedonians, and in Syria against Antiochus, have been extracted from Polybius. From a comparison of the epitome of Justin with some fragments of Posidonius of Rhodes, preserved by Athenæus, it appears that he had been the chief guide of Trogus, for the histories of Mithridates, the Ptolemies of Egypt, the Parthians and Jews, which were related in the six following books. The digression concerning the Jews is full of mistakes and confusion. Every one is aware of the erroneous notions entertained with regard to this race in the days of Augustus, and even in the age of Tacitus; and Justin, at whatever period he may have lived, has been at no pains to correct the errors of the work which he abridges. That part of the last two books which relates the ancient history of Rome, has been copied from Diocles the Peparethian, who was also the tainted authority to which Fabius Pictor unfortunately trusted, and from which have flowed all the fables concerning Mars, the Vestal Virgin, the Wolf, and Romulus and Remus.

Trojani Ludi, games instituted by Æneas, or his son Ascanius, to commemorate the death of Anchises, and celebrated in the circus of Rome. Boys of the best families, dressed in a neat manner, and accoutred with suitable arms and weapons, were permitted to enter the list. Sylla exhibited them in his dictatorship, and under Augustus they were observed with unusual pomp and solemnity. A mock fight on horseback, or sometimes on foot, was exhibited. The leader of the party was called princeps juventutis, and was generally the son of a senator, or the heir apparent to the empire. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 602.—Sueton. in Cæs. and in Aug.—Plut. in Syll.

Troïlus, a son of Priam and Hecuba, killed by Achilles during the Trojan war. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Horat. 2, ed. 9, v. 16.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 474.

Trophonius, a celebrated architect, son of Erginus, king of Orchomenos in Bœotia. He built Apollo's temple at Delphi, with the assistance of his brother Agamedes, and when he demanded of the god a reward for his trouble, he was told by the priestess to wait eight days, and to live during that time with all cheerfulness and pleasure. When the days were passed, Trophonius and his brother were found dead in their bed. According to Pausanias, however, he was swallowed up alive in the earth; and when afterwards the country was visited by a great drought, the Bœotians were directed to apply to Trophonius for relief, and to seek him at Lebadea, where he gave oracles in a cave. They discovered this cave by means of a swarm of bees, and Trophonius told them how to ease their misfortunes. The cave of Trophonius became one of the most celebrated oracles of Greece. Many ceremonies were required, and the suppliant was obliged to make particular sacrifices, to anoint his body with oil, and to bathe in the waters of certain rivers. He was to be clothed in a linen robe, and with a cake of honey in his hand, he was directed to descend into the cave by a narrow entrance, from whence he returned backwards, after he had received an answer. He was always pale and dejected at his return, and thence it became proverbial to say of a melancholy man, that he had consulted the oracle of Trophonius. There were annually exhibited games in honour of Trophonius at Lebadea. Paus. 9, c. 37, &c.—Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 47.—Plut.—Plin. 34, c. 7.—Ælian. V. H. 3, c. 45.

Tros, a son of Erichthonius, king of Troy, who married Calirrhoe, the daughter of the Schamander, by whom he had Ilus, Assaracus, and Ganymedes. He made war against Tantalus, king of Phrygia, whom he accused of having stolen away the youngest of his sons. The capital of Phrygia was called Troja from him, and the country itself Troas. Virg. 3, G. v. 36.—Homer. Il. 20, v. 219.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.

Tryphiodōrus, a Greek poet and grammarian of Egypt, in the 6th century, who wrote a poem in 24 books on the destruction of Troy, from which he excluded the α in the first book, the β in the second, and the γ in the third, &c.

Tubĕro, Q. Ælius, a Roman consul, son-in-law to Paulus the conqueror of Perseus. He is celebrated for his poverty, in which he seemed to glory, as well as the rest of his family. Sixteen of the Tuberos, with their wives and children, lived in a small house, and maintained themselves with the produce of a little field, which they cultivated with their own hands. The first piece of silver plate that entered the house of Tubero, was a small cup, which his father-in-law presented to him after he had conquered the king of Macedonia.

Tucca, Plautius, a friend of Horace and Virgil. He was, with Varus and Plotius, ordered by Augustus, as some report, to revise the Æneid of Virgil, which remained uncorrected on account of the premature death of the poet. Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 40. Sat. 19, v. 84.

Tullia, I. a daughter of Servius Tullius, king of Rome. She married Tarquin the Proud, after she had murdered her first husband Aruns, and consented to see Tullius assassinated that Tarquin might be raised to the throne. It is said that she ordered her chariot to be driven over the body of her aged father, which had been thrown, all mangled and bloody, in one of the streets of Rome. She was afterwards banished from Rome with her husband. Ovid. in Ib. 363.——II. Another daughter of Servius Tullius, who married Tarquin the Proud. She was murdered by her own husband, that he might marry her ambitious sister of the same name.

Tullia Lex, de senatu, by M. Tullius Cicero, A. U. C. 689, enacted that those who had a libera legatio granted them by the senate should hold it no more than one year. Such senators as had a libera legatio travelled through the provinces of the empire without any expense, as if they were employed in the affairs of the state.——Another, de ambitu, by the same, the same year. It forbade any person, two years before he canvassed for an office, to exhibit a show of gladiators, unless that case had devolved upon him by will. Senators guilty of the crime of ambitus, were punished with the aquæ et ignis interdictio for ten years, and the penalty inflicted on the commons was more severe than that of the Calpurnian law.

Tullĭola, or Tullia, a daughter of Cicero by Terentia. She married Caius Piso, and afterwards Furius Crassipes, and lastly P. Corn. Dolabella. With this last husband she had every reason to be dissatisfied. Dolabella was turbulent, and consequently the cause of much grief to Tullia and her father. Tullia died in childbed, about 44 years before Christ. Cicero was so inconsolable on this occasion, that some have accused him of an unnatural partiality for his daughter. According to a ridiculous story which some of the moderns report, in the age of Pope Paul 3d, a monument was discovered on the Appian road, with the superscription of Tulliolæ filiæ meæ. The body of a woman was found in it, which was reduced to ashes as soon as touched; there was also a lamp burning, which was extinguished as soon as the air gained admission there, and which was supposed to have been lighted above 1500 years. Cic.—Plut. in Cic.

Tullus, I. (Hostilius,) the third king of Rome after the death of Numa. He was of a warlike and active disposition, and signalized himself by his expedition against the people of Alba, whom he conquered, and whose city he destroyed after the famous battle of the Horatii and Curiatii. He afterwards carried his arms against the Latins and the neighbouring states with success, and enforced reverence for majesty among his subjects. He died with all his family about 640 years before the Christian era, after a reign of 32 years. The manner of his death is not precisely known. According to the most probable accounts he was murdered by Ancus Martius. Flor. 1, c. 3.—Dionys. Hal. 3, c. 1.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 814.—Liv. 1, c. 22.—Plut.——II. Lucius Volcatius, stood in the same relation to Propertius, of a patron and friend, as Messala to Tibullus and Ovid. He was nephew of that Lucius Volcatius Tullus who was consul in the year 687, and who is mentioned by Cicero, in his orations against Catiline, and his letters to Atticus. At the commencement of the civil wars, the elder Tullus espoused the cause of Julius Cæsar. His nephew, who was then a youth, followed the same party; and having steadfastly adhered to the fortunes of the adopted son, he became consul along with Augustus in 720, the year preceding the consulship of Messala and the battle of Actium. After that victory, he was employed in various foreign expeditions, and spent much of his time in Greece and Asia Minor. He possessed, however, a delightful villa in Italy, surrounded with woods, and situated on the banks of the Tiber, betwixt Rome and Ostia, at which he occasionally resided, in great splendour and luxury. If we may believe a flattering poet, he had never yielded, even in youth, to the fascinations of love, but had devoted his whole existence to the service of his country. Tullus lived to an advanced age, having survived Mæcenas, whom he had long rivalled as a patron of literature, and, after his death, almost supplied his place. He is now chiefly known as the friend of Propertius, who has addressed to him many of his elegies, expressing devoted attachment, and confiding to him the story of his unfortunate loves.

Turnus, a king of the Rutuli, son of Daunus and Venilia. He made war against Æneas, and attempted to drive him away from Italy, that he might not marry the daughter of Latinus, who had been previously engaged to him. His efforts were attended with no success, though supported with great courage and a numerous army. He was conquered, and at last killed in a single combat by Æneas. He is represented as a man of uncommon strength. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 56, &c.—Tibull. 2, el. 5, v. 49.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 879. Met. 14, v. 451.

Turullius, one of Cæsar's murderers.

Tutia, a vestal virgin, accused of incontinence. She proved herself to be innocent by carrying water from the Tiber to the temple of Vesta in a sieve, after a solemn invocation to the goddess. Liv. 20.

Tychius, a celebrated artist of Hyle in Bœotia, who made Hector's shield, which was covered with the hides of seven oxen. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 823.—Strab. 9.—Homer. Il. 7, v. 220.

Tydeus. Vid. Part III.

Tyrannion, I. a grammarian of Pontus, intimate with Cicero. His original name was Theophrastus, and he received that of Tyrannion from his austerity to his pupils. He was taken by Lucullus, and restored to his liberty by Muræna. He opened a school in the house of his friend Cicero, and enjoyed his friendship. He was extremely fond of books, and collected a library of about 30,000 volumes. To his care and industry the world is indebted for the preservation of Aristotle's works.——II. There was also one of his disciples called Diocles, who bore his name. He was a native of Phœnicia, and was made prisoner in the war of Augustus and Antony. He was bought by Dymes, one of the emperor's favourites, and afterwards by Terentia, who gave him his liberty. He wrote 68 different volumes, in one of which he proved that the Latin tongue was derived from the Greek, and another in which Homer's poems were corrected, &c.

Tyrtæus, a Greek elegiac poet, born in Attica, son of Archimbrotus. In the second Messenian war the Lacedæmonians were directed by the oracle to apply to the Athenians for a general, if they wished to finish their expedition with success, and they were contemptuously presented with Tyrtæus. The poet animated the Lacedæmonians with martial songs, just as they wished to raise the siege of Ithome, and inspired them with so much courage that they defeated the Messenians. For his services he was made a citizen of Lacedæmon, and treated with great attention. Of the compositions of Tyrtæus nothing is extant but the fragments of four or five elegies. He flourished about 684 B. C. Justin. 2, c. 5.—Strab. 8.—Aristot. Polit. 5, c. 7.—Horat. de Art. p. 402.—Elian. V. H. 12, c. 50.—Paus. 4, c. 6, &c.

V.

Vacationes (lex de), was enacted concerning the exemption from military service, and contained this very remarkable clause, nisi bellum Gallicum exoriatur, in which case the priests themselves were not exempted from service. This can intimate how apprehensive the Romans were of the Gauls, by whom their city had once been taken.

Valens, I. (Flavius,) a son of Gratian, born in Pannonia. His brother Valentinian took him as his colleague on the throne, and appointed him over the eastern parts of the Roman empire. The bold measures, and the threats of the rebel Procopius, frightened the new emperor; and, if his friends had not intervened, he would have willingly resigned all his pretensions to the empire, which his brother had intrusted to his care. By permitting some of the Goths to settle in the provinces of Thrace, and to have free access to every part of the country, Valens encouraged them to make depredations on his subjects, and to disturb their tranquillity. His eyes were opened too late; he attempted to repel them, but he failed in the attempt. A bloody battle was fought, in which the barbarians obtained some advantage, and Valens was hurried away by the obscurity of the night, and the affection of his soldiers for his person, into a lonely house which the Goths set on fire. Valens, unable to make his escape, was burnt alive, in the 50th year of his age, after a reign of 15 years, A. D. 378. He put to death all such of his subjects whose name began by Theod, because he had been informed, by his favourite astrologers, that his crown would devolve upon the head of an officer whose name began with these letters. Valens did not possess any of the qualities which distinguish a great and powerful monarch. He was illiterate, and of a disposition naturally indolent and inactive. Yet, though fond of ease, he was acquainted with the character of his officers, and preferred none but such as possessed merit. He was a great friend of discipline, a pattern of chastity and temperance, and he showed himself always ready to listen to the just complaints of his subjects, though he gave an attentive ear to flattery and malevolent informations. Ammian. &c. ——II. Valerius, a pro-consul of Achaia, who proclaimed himself emperor of Rome, when Marcian, who had been invested with the purple in the East, attempted to assassinate him. He reigned only six months, and was murdered by his soldiers, A. D. 261.——III. Fabius, a friend of Vitellius, whom he saluted emperor in opposition to Otho. He was greatly honoured by Vitellius, &c.

Valentinianus I. a son of Gratian, raised to the imperial throne by his merit and valour. He kept the western part of the empire for himself, and appointed over the East his brother Valens. He gave the most convincing proof of his military valour in the victories which he obtained over the barbarians in the provinces of Gaul, the deserts of Africa, or on the banks of the Rhine and the Danube. The insolence of the Quadi he punished with great severity. While he spoke to them in warmth, he broke a blood-vessel and fell lifeless on the ground. He was conveyed into his palace by his attendants, and soon after died, suffering the greatest agonies, violent fits, and contortions of his limbs, on the 17th of November, A. D. 375. He was then in the 55th year of his age, and had reigned 12 years. He was naturally of an irascible disposition, and he gratified his pride in expressing a contempt for those who were his equals in military abilities, or who shone for gracefulness or elegance of address. Ammian. ——About six days after the death of Valentinian, his second son, Valentinian the second, was proclaimed emperor, though only five years old. He succeeded his brother Gratian, A. D. 383, but his youth seemed to favour dissension, and the attempts and the usurpations of rebels. He was robbed of his throne by Maximus, four years after the death of Gratian; and in this helpless situation he had recourse to Theodosius, who was then emperor of the East. He was successful in his applications; Maximus was conquered by Theodosius, and Valentinian entered Rome in triumph, accompanied by his benefactor. He was some time after strangled by one of his officers, a native of Gaul, called Arbogastes, in whom he had placed too much confidence. Valentinian reigned nine years. This happened the 15th of May, A. D. 292, at Vienne, one of the modern towns of France. He has been commended for his many virtues, and the applause which the populace bestowed upon him was bestowed upon real merit. He was fond of imitating the virtues and exemplary life of his friend and patron Theodosius, and if he had lived longer, the Romans might have enjoyed peace and security.——Valentinian the third, was son of Constantius and Placidia, the daughter of Theodosius the Great, and therefore, as related to the imperial family, he was saluted emperor in his youth, and publicly acknowledged as such in Rome, the 3d of October, A. D. 423, about the 6th year of his age. He was at first governed by his mother and the intrigues of his generals and courtiers; and when he came to years of discretion, he disgraced himself by violence, oppression, and incontinence. He was murdered in the midst of Rome, A. D. 454, in the 36th year of his age and 31st of his reign, by Petronius Maximus, to whose life he had offered violence. The vices of Valentinian the third were conspicuous; every passion he wished to gratify at the expense of his honour, his health, and character; and as he lived without one single act of benevolence or kindness, he died lamented by none. He was the last of the family of Theodosius.

Valeria, I. a sister of Publicola, who advised the Roman matrons to go and deprecate the resentment of Coriolanus. Plut. in Cor.——II. A daughter of Publicola, given as a hostage to Porsenna by the Romans. She fled from the enemy's country with Clœlia, and swam across the Tiber. Plut. de Virt. Mul.——III. A daughter of Messala, sister of Hortensius, who married Sylla.——IV. The wife of the emperor Valentinian.——V. The wife of the emperor Galerius, &c.

Valeria Lex, de provocatione, by P. Valerius Poplicola, the sole consul, A. U. C. 243. It permitted the appeal from a magistrate to the people, and forbade the magistrates to punish a citizen for making the appeal. It further made it a capital crime for a citizen to aspire to the sovereignty of Rome, or to exercise any office without the choice and approbation of the people. Val. Max. 4, c. 1.—Liv. 2, c. 8.—Dion. Hal. 4.——Another, de debitoribus, by Valerius Flaccus. It required that all creditors should discharge their debtors on receiving a fourth part of the whole sum.——Another, by M. Valerius Corvinus, A. U. C. 453, which confirmed the first Valerian law, enacted by Poplicola.——Another called also Horatia, by L. Valerius and M. Horatius the consuls, A. U. C. 304. It revived the first Valerian law, which under the triumvirate had lost its force. ——Another, de magistratibus, by P. Valerius Poplicola, sole consul, A. U. C. 243. It created two quæstors to take care of the public treasure, which was for the future to be kept in the temple of Saturn. Plut. in Pop.—Liv. 2.

Valerianus, Publius Licinius, a Roman, proclaimed emperor by the armies in Rhætia, A. D. 254. The virtues which shone in him when a private man, were lost when he ascended the throne. He was cowardly in his operations, and, though acquainted with war and the patron of science, he seldom acted with prudence, or favoured men of true genius and merit. He took his son Gallienus as his colleague in the empire, and showed the malevolence of his heart by persecuting the Christians whom he had for a while tolerated. He also made war against the Goths and Scythians; but in an expedition which he undertook against Sapor, king of Persia, his arms were attended with ill success. He was conquered in Mesopotamia, and when he wished to have a private conference with Sapor, the conqueror seized his person, and carried him in triumph to his capital, where he exposed him, and in all the cities of his empire, to the ridicule and insolence of his subjects. When the Persian monarch mounted on horseback, Valerian served as a footstool, and the many other insults which he suffered excited indignation even among the courtiers of Sapor. The monarch at last ordered him to be flayed alive, and salt to be thrown over his mangled body, so that he died in the greatest torments. His skin was tanned, and painted in red; and that the ignominy of the Roman people might be lasting, it was nailed in one of the temples of Persia. Valerian died in the 71st year of his age, A. D. 260, after a reign of seven years.

Valerius Publius, I. a celebrated Roman, surnamed Poplicola for his popularity. He was very active in assisting Brutus to expel the Tarquins, and he was the first that took an oath to support the liberty and independence of his country. Though he had been refused the consulship, and had retired with great dissatisfaction from the direction of affairs, yet he regarded the public opinion, and when the jealousy of the Romans inveighed against the towering appearance of his house, he acknowledged the reproof, and in making it lower the showed his wish to be on a level with his fellow-citizens, and not to erect what might be considered as a citadel for the oppression of his country. He was afterwards honoured with the consulship, on the expulsion of Collatinus, and he triumphed over the Etrurians after he had gained the victory in the battle in which Brutus and the sons of Tarquin had fallen. Valerius died after he had been four times consul, and enjoyed the popularity, and received the thanks and gratitude, which people redeemed from slavery and oppression usually pay to their patrons and deliverers. He was so poor that his body was buried at the public expense. The Roman matrons mourned his death a whole year. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor. 1, c. 9.—Liv. 3, c. 8, &c.——II. Corvinus, a tribune of the soldiers under Camillus. When the Roman army were challenged by one of the Senones remarkable for his strength and stature, Valerius undertook to engage him, and obtained an easy victory, by means of a crow that assisted him, and attacked the face of the Gaul; whence his surname of Corvinus. Valerius triumphed over the Etrurians, and the neighbouring states that made war against Rome, and was six times honoured with the consulship. He died in the 100th year of his age, admired and regretted for many private and public virtues. Val. Max. 8, c. 13.—Liv. 7, c. 27, &c.—Plut. in Mar.—Cic. in Cat.——III. Antias, an excellent Roman historian often quoted, and particularly by Livy.——IV. Flaccus, a consul with Cato, whose friendship he honourably shared. He made war against the Insubres and Boii, and killed 10,000 of the enemy.——V. Marcus Corvinus Messala, a Roman made consul with Augustus. He distinguished himself by his learning as well as military virtues. He lost his memory about two years before his death, and, according to some, he was even ignorant of his own name. Sueton. in Aug.—Cic. in Brut.——VI. Soranas, a Latin poet in the age of Julius Cæsar, put to death for betraying a secret. He acknowledged no god but the soul of the universe.——VII. Maximus, a brother of Poplicola.——VIII. A Latin historian, who carried arms under the sons of Pompey. He dedicated his time to study, and wrote an account of all the most celebrated sayings and actions of the Romans, and other illustrious persons, which is still extant, and divided into nine books. It is dedicated to Tiberius. Some have supposed that he lived after the age of Tiberius, from the want of purity and elegance which so conspicuously appear in his writings, unworthy of the correctness of the golden age of the Roman literature. The best editions of Valerius are those of Torrenius, 4to. L. Bat. 1726, and of Vorstius, 8vo. Berolin, 1672.——IX. Marcus, a brother of Poplicola, who defeated the army of the Sabines in two battles. He was honoured with a triumph, and the Romans, to show their sense of his great merit, built him a house on mount Palatine at the public expense.——X. Potitus, a general who stirred up the people and army against the decemvirs, and Appius Claudius in particular. He was chosen consul, and conquered the Volsci and Æqui.——XI. Flaccus, a Roman, intimate with Cato the censor. He was consul with him, and cut off an army of 10,000 Gauls in one battle. He was also chosen censor, and prince of the senate, &c.——XII. A Latin poet who flourished under Vespasian. He wrote a poem in eight books on the Argonautic expedition, but it remained unfinished on account of his premature death. The Argonauts were there left on the sea in their return home. Some critics have been lavish in their praises upon Flaccus, and have called him the second poet of Rome after Virgil. His poetry, however, is deemed by some frigid and languishing, and his style uncouth and inelegant. The best editions of Flaccus are those of Burman, L. Bat. 1724, and 12mo. Utr. 1702.——XIII. Asiaticus, a celebrated Roman, accused of having murdered one of the relations of the emperor Claudius. He was condemned by the intrigues of Messalina, though innocent, and he opened his veins and bled to death. Tacit. Ann.

Valgius, Rufus, a Roman poet in the Augustan age, celebrated for his writings. He was very intimate with Horace. Tibull. 3, l. 1, v. 180.—Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 82.

Vannius, a king of the Suevi, banished under Claudius, &c. Tacit. Ann. 22, c. 29.

Varia Lex, de Civitate, by Q. Varius Hybrida. It punished all such as were suspected of having assisted or supported the people of Italy in their petition to become free citizens of Rome. Cic. pro Mil. 36, in Brut. 56, 88, &c.

Varius, or Varus, Lucius, was one of the most eminent poets of the Augustan age. He had been present in his youth at the battle of Philippi, and had afterwards joined Sextus Pompey in Sicily. Nevertheless, he was patronised by Mæcenas, to whose notice he first introduced Horace; and he accompanied that minister on his celebrated journey to Brundisium. Previous, indeed, to the appearance of the Æneid, he was considered as the first epic poet of Rome, or at least equal to Valgius. At the time when Virgil was chiefly known as a pastoral poet, Horace says of him:—

——Forte epos acer,

and he also considered him as the writer who was most worthy to celebrate in heroic verse the exploits of Agrippa. At a subsequent period, when Virgil had become more distinguished, he mentions Varius along with him as representative of the best class of poets in the Augustan age. His eminence as an epic poet, and his friendship with Virgil procured him the distinction of being appointed by Augustus along with Tucca to revise the Æneid, and bring it before the public. Varius was the author of a panegyric on Augustus; but it was probably some longer work which procured him such celebrity as an epic poet, though it is not known what was the name or subject of this production. It is somewhat remarkable, however, that Quintilian, in his review of the Latin poets, in the tenth book of his Institutes, does not mention Varius as an epic writer, and only alludes to him as the author of the tragedy called Thyestes, which he says was equal to any composition of the Greek poets. Horat. 4, sat. 5, v. 40.

Varro, I. (M. Terentius,) a Roman consul, defeated at Cannæ by Annibal. Vid. Terentius.——II. Was born in the 637th year of Rome, and was descended of an ancient senatorial family. It is probable that his youth, and even the greater part of his manhood, were spent in literary pursuits, and in the acquisition of that stupendous knowledge, which has procured to him the appellation of the most learned of the Romans, since his name does not appear in the civil or military history of his country, till the year 680, when he was consul along with Cassius Varus. In 686, he served under Pompey, in his war against the pirates, in which he commanded the Greek ships. To the fortunes of that chief he continued firmly attached, and was appointed one of his lieutenants in Spain, along with Afranius and Petreius, at the commencement of the war with Cæsar. Hispania Ulterior was specially confided to his protection, and two legions were placed under his command. After the surrender of his colleagues in Hither Spain, Cæsar proceeded in person against him. Varro appears to have been little qualified to cope with such an adversary. One of the legions deserted in his own sight, and his retreat to Cadiz, where he had meant to retire, having been cut off, he surrendered at discretion, with the other, in the vicinity of Cordova. From that period he despaired of the salvation of the republic, or found, at least, that he was not capable of saving it; for although, after receiving his freedom from Cæsar, he proceeded to Dyrrachium, to give Pompey a detail of the disasters which had occurred, he left it almost immediately for Rome. On his return to Italy he withdrew from all political concerns, and indulged himself during the remainder of his life in the enjoyment of literary leisure. The only service he performed for Cæsar, was that of arranging the books which the dictator had himself procured, or which had been acquired by those who preceded him in the management of public affairs. He lived during the reign of Cæsar in habits of the closest intimacy with Cicero; and his feelings, as well as conduct, at this period, resembled those of his illustrious friend, who, in all his letters to Varro, bewails, with great freedom, the utter ruin of the state, and proposes that they should live together, engaged only in those studies which were formerly their amusement, but were then their chief support. The site of Varro's villa was visited by Sir R. C. Hoare, who says, that it stood close to Casinum, now St. Germano: some trifling remains still indicate its site; but its memory, he adds, will shortly survive only in the page of the historian. After the assassination of Cæsar, this residence, along with almost all the wealth of Varro, which was immense, was forcibly seized by Marc Antony. Its lawless occupation by that profligate and blood-thirsty triumvir, on his return from his dissolute expedition to Capua, is introduced by Cicero into one of his philippics, and forms a topic of the most eloquent and bitter invective. Antony was not a person to be satisfied with robbing Varro of his property. At the formation of the memorable triumvirate, the name of Varro appeared in the list of the proscribed, among those other friends of Pompey whom the clemency of Cæsar had spared. This illustrious and blameless individual had now passed the age of seventy; and nothing can afford a more striking proof of the sanguinary spirit which guided the councils of the triumvirs, than their devoting to the dagger of the hired assassin a man equally venerable by his years and character, and who ought to have been protected, if not by his learned labours, at least by his retirement, from such inhuman persecution. But, though doomed to death as a friend of law and liberty, his friends contended with each other for the dangerous honour of saving him. Calenus having obtained the preference, carried him to his country-house, were Antony frequently came, without suspecting that it contained a proscribed inmate. Here Varro remained concealed till a special edict was issued by the consul, M. Plancus, under the triumviral seal, excepting him and Messala Corvinus from the general slaughter. But though Varro thus passed in security the hour of danger, he was unable to save his library, which was placed in the garden of one of his villas, and fell into the hands of an illiterate soldiery. After the battle of Actium, Varro resided in tranquillity at Rome till his decease, which happened in 727, when he was ninety years of age. The tragical deaths, however, of Pompey and Cicero, with the loss of others of his friends,—the ruin of his country—the expulsion from his villas—and the loss of those literary treasures which he had stored up as the solace of his old age, and the want of which would be doubly felt by one who wished to devote all his time to study,—cast a deep shade over the concluding days of this illustrious scholar. His wealth was restored by Augustus, but his books could not be supplied. It is not improbable, that the dispersion of this library, which impeded the prosecution of his studies, and prevented the composition of such works as required reference and consultation, may have induced Varro to employ the remaining hours of his life in delivering those precepts of agriculture, which had been the result of long experience, and which needed only reminiscence to inculcate. It was some time after the loss of his books, and when he had nearly reached the age of eighty, that Varro composed the work on husbandry, as he himself testifies in the introduction. The first of the three books, which this agricultural treatise comprehends, is addressed to Fundanius, and is devoted to rules for the cultivation of land, whether for the production of grain, pulse, olives, or vines, and the establishment necessary for a well-managed and lucrative farm; excluding from consideration what is strictly the business of the grazier and shepherd, rather than of the farmer. The subject of agriculture, strictly so called, having been discussed in the first book, Varro proceeds in the second, addressed to Niger Turranus, to treat of the care of flocks and cattle, (De Re Pecuaria). The knowledge which he here communicates is the result of his own observations, blended with the information he had received from the great pasturers of Epirus, at the time when he commanded the Grecian ships on its coast, in Pompey's naval war with the pirates. As in the former book the instruction is delivered in the shape of dialogue. This book concludes with what forms the most profitable part of pasturage—the dairy and sheep-shearing. The third book, which is by far the most interesting and best written in the work, treats de villicis pastionibus, which means the provisions, or moderate luxuries, which a plain farmer may procure, independent of tillage or pasturage,—as the poultry of his barn-yard—the trouts in the stream, by which his farm is bounded—and the game, which he may enclose in parks, or chance to take on days of recreation. If others of the agricultural writers have been more minute with regard to the construction of the villa itself, it is to Varro we are chiefly indebted for what lights we have received concerning its appertenances, as warrens, aviaries, and fish-ponds. The work De Lingua Latina, though it has descended to us incomplete, is by much the most entire of Varro's writings, except the Treatise on Agriculture. It is on account of this philological production, that Aulus Gellius ranks him among the grammarians, who form a numerous and important class in the history of Latin literature. They were called grammatici by the Romans—a word which would be better rendered philologers than grammarians. We find in the work De Lingua Latina, which was written during the winter preceding Cæsar's death, the same methodical arrangement that marks the treatise De Re Rustica. It is not certain whether the Libri De Similitudine Verborum, and those De Utilitate Sermonis, cited by Priscian and Charisius as philological works of Varro, were parts of his great production, De Lingua Latina, or separate compositions. There was a distinct treatise, however, De Sermone Latino, addressed to Marcellus, of which a very few fragments are preserved by Aulus Gellius. The critical works of this universal scholar, were entitled, De Proprietate Scriptorum—De Poetis—De Poematis—Theatrales, sive de Actionibus Scenicis—De Scenicis Originibus—De Plautinis Comœdiis—De Plautinis Quæstionibus—De Compositione Satirarum—Rhetoricorum Libri. These works are praised or mentioned by Gellius, Nonius Marcellus, and Diomedes; but almost nothing is known of their contents. Somewhat more may be gathered concerning Varro's mythological or theological works, as they were much studied, and very frequently cited by the early fathers, particularly St. Augustine and Lactantius. Of these the chief is the treatise De Cultu Deorum, noticed by St. Augustine in his seventh book, De Civitate Dei, where he says that Varro considers God to be not only the soul of the world, but the world itself. In this work he also treated of the origin of hydromancy, and other superstitious divinations. Sixteen books of the treatise De Rerum Humanarum et Divinarum Antiquitatibus, addressed to Julius Cæsar, as Pontifex Maximus, related to theological, or at least what we might call ecclesiastical subjects. This work, which is said to have chiefly contributed to the splendid reputation of Varro, was extant as late as the beginning of the fourteenth century. Plutarch, in his life of Romulus, speaks of Varro as a man of all the Romans most versed in history. The historical and political works are the Annales Libri—Belli Punici Secundi Liber—De Initiis Urbis Romanæ—De Gente Populi Romani—Libri de Familiis Trojanis, which last treated of the families that followed Æneas into Italy. With this class we may rank the Hebdomadum, sive de Imaginibus Libri, containing the panegyrics of 700 illustrious men. There was a picture of each, with a legend or verse under it, like those in the children's histories of the kings of England. That annexed to the portrait of Demetrius Phalereus, who had upwards of 300 brazen statues erected to him by the Athenians, is still preserved:—

> Quot luces habet annus absolutus."

There were seven pictures and panegyrics in each book, whence the whole work has been called Hebdomades. Varro has adopted the superstitious notions of the ancients concerning particular numbers, and the number seven seems specially to have commanded his veneration. There were in the world seven wonders—there were seven wise men among the Greeks—there were seven chariots in the Circensian games—and seven chiefs were chosen to make war on Thebes: all which he sums up with remarking, that he himself had then entered his twelfth period of seven years, on which day he had written seventy times seven books, many of which, in consequence of his proscription, had been lost in the plunder of his library. The treatise entitled Sisenna, sive de Historia, was a tract on the composition of history, inscribed to Sisenna, the Roman historian, who wrote an account of the civil wars of Marius and Sylla. It contained, it is said, many excellent precepts with regard to the appropriate style of history, and the accurate investigation of facts. But the greatest service rendered by Varro to history was his attempt to fix the chronology of the world. Censorinus informs us that he was the first who regulated chronology by eclipses. The philosophical writings of Varro are not numerous; but his chief work of that description, entitled De Philosophia Liber, appears to have been very comprehensive. St. Augustine informs us that Varro examined in it all the various sects of philosophers, of which he enumerated upwards of 280. The sect of the old academy was that which he himself followed, and its tenets he maintained in opposition to all others. It is not certain under what class Varro's Novemlibri Disciplinarum should be ranked, as it probably comprehended instructive lessons in the whole range of arts and sciences. One of the chapters, according to Vitruvius, was on the subject of architecture. Varro derived much notoriety from his satirical compositions. His Tricarenus or Tricipitina, was a satiric history of the triumvirate of Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus. Much pleasantry and sarcasm were also interspersed in his books entitled Logistorici; but his most celebrated production in that line was the satire which he himself entitled Menippean. It was so called from the cynic Menippus of Gadara, a city in Syria, who, like his countryman Meleager, was in the habit of expressing himself jocularly on the most grave and important subjects. He was the author of a Symposium, in the manner of Xenophon. His writings were interspersed with verses, parodied from Homer and the tragic poets, or ludicrously applied for the purpose of burlesque. It is not known, however, that he wrote any professed satire. Besides the works of Varro abovementioned, there is a miscellaneous collection of sentences or maxims which have been attributed to him, though it is not known in what part of his numerous writings they were originally introduced. Barthius found seventeen of these sentences in a MS. of the middle age, and printed them in his Adversaria. Schneider afterwards discovered, in the Speculum Historiale of Vincent de Beauvais, a monk of the thirteenth century, a much more ample collection of them, which he has inserted in his edition of the Scriptores rei Rusticæ. They consist of moral maxims in the style of those preserved from the Mimes of Publius Syrus, and had doubtless been culled as flowers from the works of Varro, at a time when the immense garden of taste and learning, which he planted, had not yet been laid waste by the hand of time, or the spoiler. The best edition of Varro is that of Dordrac, 8vo. 1619. Cic. in Acad. &c.—Quintil.——III. Attacinus, a native of Gaul in the age of J. Cæsar. He translated into Latin verse the Argonautica of Apollonius Rhodius, with great correctness and elegance. He also wrote a poem entitled de Bello Sequanico, besides epigrams and elegies. Some fragments of his poetry are still extant. He failed in his attempt to write satire. Horat. 1, sat. 10, v. 46.—Ovid. Ann. 1, v. 15.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.

Varus, Quintilius, I. a Roman proconsul, descended from an illustrious family. He was appointed governor of Syria, and afterwards made commander of the armies in Germany. He was surprised by the enemy, under Arminius, a crafty and dissimulating chief, and his army was cut to pieces. When he saw that every thing was lost, he killed himself, A. D. 10, and his example was followed by some of his officers. His head was afterwards sent to Augustus at Rome by one of the barbarian chiefs, as also his body; and so great was the influence of his defeat upon the emperor, that he continued for whole months to show all the marks of dejection and of deep sorrow, often exclaiming, "O Varus, restore me my legions." The bodies of the slain were left in the field of battle, where they were found six years after by Germanicus, and buried with great pomp. His avarice was conspicuous; he went poor to Syria, whence he returned loaded with riches. Horat. 1, od. 24.—Paterc. 2, c. 117.—Flor. 4, c. 12.—Virg. Ecl. 6.——II. A son of Varus, who married a daughter of Germanicus. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 6.——III. The father and grandfather of Varus, who was killed in Germany, slew themselves with their own swords, the one after the battle of Philippi, and the other in the plains of Pharsalia.——IV. Quintinius, a friend of Horace and other great men in the Augustan age. He was a good judge of poetry, and a great critic, as Horace, Art. P. 438, seems to insinuate. The poet has addressed the 18th ode of his first book to him, and in the 24th he mourns pathetically his death. Some suppose this Varus to be the person killed in Germany, while others believe him to be a man who devoted his time more to the muses than to war. Vid. Varius.——V. Lucius, an Epicurean philosopher, intimate with J. Cæsar. Some suppose that it was to him that Virgil inscribed his sixth eclogue. He is commended by Quintil. 6, c. 3, 78.——VI. Alfrenus, a Roman, who, though originally a shoemaker, became consul, and distinguished himself by his abilities as an orator. He was buried at the public expense, an honour granted to few, and only to persons of merit. Horat. 1, sat. 3.

Vantinius, I. an intimate friend of Cicero, once distinguished for his enmity to the orator. He hated the people of Rome for their great vices and corruption, whence excessive hatred became proverbial in the words Vatinianum Odium. Catull. 14, v. 3.——II. A shoemaker, ridiculed for his deformities and the oddity of his character. He was one of Nero's favourites, and he surpassed the rest of the courtiers in flattery, and in the commission of every impious deed. Large cups, of no value, are called Vatiniani from him, because he used one which was both ill-shaped and uncouth. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 34.—Juv.—Mart. 14, ep. 96.

Vedius Pollio. Vid. Pollio.

Vegetius, a Latin writer, who flourished B. C. 386. The best edition of his treatise de Re Militari, together with Modestus, is that of Paris, 4to. 1607.

Velleius, I. (Paterculus,) a Roman historian, descended from an equestrian family of Campania. He was at first a military tribune in the Roman armies, and for nine years served under Tiberius in the various expeditions which he undertook in Gaul and Germany. Velleius wrote an epitome of the history of Greece and of Rome, and of other nations of the most remote antiquity; but of this authentic composition there remain only fragments of the history of Greece and Rome from the conquest of Perseus, by Paulus, to the 17th year of the reign of Tiberius, in two books. It is a judicious account of celebrated men and illustrious cities; the historian is happy in his descriptions and accurate in his dates; his pictures are true, and his narrative lively and interesting. The whole is candid and impartial till the reign of the Cæsars, when the writer began to be influenced by the presence of the emperor, or the power of his favourites. Paterculus is deservedly censured for his invectives against Cicero and Pompey, and his encomiums on the cruel Tiberius and the unfortunate Sejanus. Some suppose that he was involved in the ruin of this disappointed courtier, whom he had extolled as a pattern of virtue and morality. The best editions of Paterculus are those of Ruhnkenius, 8vo. 2 vols. L. Bat. 1779; of Barbou, Paris, 12mo. 1777; and of Burman, 8vo. L. Bat. 1719.——II. Caius, the grandfather of the historian of that name, was one of the friends of Livia. He killed himself when old and unable to accompany Livia in her flight.

Veneti. Vid. Part I.

Ventidius, Bassus, a native of Picenum, born of an obscure family. When Asculum was taken, he was carried before the triumphal chariot of Pompeius Strabo, hanging on his mother's breast. A bold, aspiring soul, aided by the patronage of the family of Cæsar, raised him from the mean occupation of a chairman and muleteer to dignity in the state. He displayed valour in the Roman armies, and gradually arose to the offices of tribune, prætor, high-priest, and consul. He made war against the Parthians, and conquered them in three great battles, B. C. 39. He was the first Roman ever honoured with a triumph over Parthia. He died greatly lamented by the all Roman people, and was buried at the public expense. Plut. in Anton.—Juv. 7, v. 199.

Veranius, a governor of Britain under Nero. He succeeded Didius Gallus. Tacit. 14, Ann.

Vercingetorix, a chief of the Gauls in the time of Cæsar. He was conquered and led in triumph, &c. Cæsar. Bell. G. 7. c. 4.—Flor. 3, c. 10.

Verginius, one of the officers of the Roman troops in Germany, who refused the absolute power which his soldiers offered to him. Tacit. 1, Hist. c. 8.

Verres, C. a Roman, who governed the province of Sicily as prætor. The oppression and rapine of which he was guilty while in office, so offended the Sicilians, that they brought an accusation against him before the Roman senate. Cicero undertook the cause of the Sicilians, and pronounced those celebrated orations which are still extant. Verres was defended by Hortensius, but as he despaired of the success of his defence, he left Rome without waiting for his sentence, and lived in great affluence in one of the provinces. He was at last killed by one of the soldiers of Antony the triumvir, about 26 years after his voluntary exile from the capital. Cic. in Ver.—Plin. 34, c. 2. Lactant. 2, c. 4.

Verrius Flaccus, a freedman and grammarian, famous for his powers in instructing. He was appointed over the grandchildren of Augustus, and also distinguished himself by his writings. Gell. 4, c. 5.—Suet. in Gram.

Verrius Flaccus, a Latin critic, B. C. 4, whose works have been edited with Dacier and Clerk's notes, 4to. Amst. 1699.

Verulānus, a lieutenant under Corbulo, who drove away Tiridates from Media, &c. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 26.

Verus, I. (Lucius Ceionius Commodus,) a Roman emperor, son of Ælius and Domitia Lucilla. He was adopted in the 7th year of his age, by M. Aurelius, at the request of Adrian, and he married Lucilia, the daughter of his adopted father, who also took him as his colleague on the throne. He was sent by M. Aurelius to oppose the barbarians in the East. His arms were attended with success, and he obtained a victory over the Parthians. He was honoured with a triumph at his return home, and soon after he marched with his imperial colleague against the Marcomanni in Germany. He died in this expedition of an apoplexy, in the 39th year of his age, after a reign of eight years and some months. His body was brought back to Rome, and buried by M. Aurelius with great pomp and solemnity. Verus has been greatly censured for his debaucheries. At one entertainment alone, where there were no more than 12 guests, the emperor spent no less than six millions of sesterces, or about 32,200*l.* sterling. In his Parthian expedition Verus did not check his vicious propensities; for four years he left the care of the war to his officers, while he retired to the voluptuous retreats of Daphne, and the luxurious banquets of Antioch. His fondness for a horse has been faithfully recorded. The animal had a statue of gold, and when dead, the emperor to express his sorrow, raised him a magnificent monument on mount Vatican.——II. L. Annæus, a son of the emperor Aurelius, who died in Palestine.——III. The father of the emperor Verus. He was adopted by the emperor Adrian, but, like his son, he disgraced himself by his debaucheries and extravagance. He died before Adrian.

Vespasiānus, (Titus Flavius,) a Roman emperor, descended from an obscure family at Reate. He was honoured with the consulship as a reward for his private merit and his public services. He accompanied Nero into Greece, but he offended the prince by falling asleep while he repeated one of his poetical compositions. This momentary resentment of the emperor did not prevent Vespasian from being sent to carry on a war against the Jews. His operations were crowned with success; many of the cities of Palestine surrendered, and Vespasian began the siege of Jerusalem. This was, however, achieved by the hands of his son Titus, and the death of Vitellius and the affection of his soldiers hastened his rise, and he was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria. The choice of the army was approved by every province of the empire; but Vespasian did not betray any signs of pride at so sudden and so unexpected an exaltation, and though once employed in the mean office of a horse doctor, he behaved, when invested with the imperial purple, with all the dignity which became a successor of Augustus. In the beginning of his reign Vespasian attempted to reform the manners of the Romans. He repaired the public buildings, embellished the city, and made the great roads more spacious and convenient. After he had reigned with great popularity for 10 years, Vespasian died, A. D. 79, in the 70th year of his age. He was the first Roman emperor who was succeeded by his own son on the throne. Vespasian has been admired for his great virtues. When the king of Parthia addressed him with the superscription of Arsaces, king of kings, to Flavius Vespasianus, the emperor, no way dissatisfied, answered him again in his own words, Flavius Vespasianus, to Arsaces, king of kings. To men of learning and merit Vespasian was very liberal; one hundred thousand sesterces were annually expended to encourage and promote the arts and sciences. Sueton. in vitâ.—Tacit. Hist. 4.

Vestāles, priestesses among the Romans, consecrated to the service of Vesta, as their name indicates. This office was very ancient, as the mother of Romulus was one of the vestals. Æneas is supposed to have first chosen the vestals. Numa first appointed four, to which Tarquin added two. They were always chosen by the monarchs, but after the expulsion of the Tarquins, the highpriest was intrusted with the care of them. As they were to be virgins, they were chosen young, from the age of six to ten; and if there was not a sufficient number that presented themselves as candidates for the office, twenty virgins were selected, and they upon whom the lot fell were obliged to become priestesses. Plebeians as well as patricians were permitted to propose themselves, but it was required that they should be without blemish or deformity. For thirty years they were to remain in the greatest continence; the ten first years were spent in learning the duties of the order, the ten following were employed in discharging them with fidelity and sanctity, and the ten last in instructing such as had entered the noviciate. When the thirty years were elapsed they were permitted to marry, or, if they still preferred celibacy, they waited upon the rest of the vestals. The employment of the vestals was to take care that the sacred fire of Vesta was not extinguished, for if it ever happened, it was deemed the prognostic of great calamities to the state. In such a case all was consternation at Rome, and the fire was again kindled by glasses with the rays of the sun. Another equally particular charge of the vestals was to keep a sacred pledge, on which depended the very existence of Rome, which, according to some, was the palladium of Troy. The privi'eges of the vestals were great, they had the most honourable seats at public games and festivals, a lictor with the fasces always preceded them when they walked in public, they were carried in chariots when they pleased, and they had the power of pardoning criminals when led to execution if they declared that their meeting was accidental. Their declarations in trials were received without the formality of an oath, they were chosen as arbiters in causes of moment, and in the execution of wills; and so great was the deference paid them by the magistrates, as well as by the people, that the consuls themselves made way for them, and bowed their fasces when they passed before them. To insult them was a capital crime, and whoever attempted to violate their chastity was beaten to death with scourges. If any of them died while in office, their body was buried within the walls of the city, an honour granted to few. Such of the vestals as proved incontinent were punished in the most rigorous manner. Numa ordered them to be stoned, but Tarquin the elder dug a hole under the earth, where a bed was placed with a little bread, wine, water, and oil, and a lighted lamp, and the guilty vestal was stripped of the habit of her order, and compelled to descend into the subterraneous cavity, which was immediately shut, and she was left to die through hunger. For the space of one thousand years, during which the order continued established, from the reign of Numa, only eighteen were punished for the violation of their vow. The vestals were abolished by Theodosius the Great, and the fire of Vesta extinguished. The dress of the vestals was peculiar; they wore a white vest with purple borders, a white linen surplice called linteum superum, above which was a great purple mantle which flowed to the ground, and which was tucked up when they offered sacrifices. They had a close covering on their head, called insula, from which hung ribands, or vittæ. Their manner of living was sumptuous, as they were maintained at the public expense. Liv. 2, &c.—Plut. in Num. &c.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 30.—Flor. 1.—Propert. 4, el. 11.—Tacit. 4, c. 10.

Vestālia, festivals in honour of Vesta, observed at Rome on the 9th of June. Banquets were then prepared before the houses, and meat was sent to the vestals to be offered to the gods, millstones were decked with garlands, and the asses that turned them were led round the city covered with garlands. The ladies walked in the procession barefooted, to the temple of the goddess, and an altar was erected to Jupiter surnamed Pistor. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 305.

Vettius, (Sp.) I. a Roman senator, who was made interrex at the death of Romulus till the election of another king. He nominated Numa, and resigned his office. Plut. in Num. ——II. Cato, one of the officers of the allies in the Marsian war. He defeated the Romans, and was at last betrayed and murdered.——III. A Roman knight who became enamoured of a young female at Capua, and raised a tumult amongst the slaves who proclaimed him king. He was betrayed by one of his adherents, upon which he laid violent hands on himself.

Vetūria, the mother of Coriolanus. She was solicited by all the Roman matrons to go to her son with her daughter-in-law, and entreat him not to make war against his country. She went and prevailed over Coriolanus, and for her services to the state, the Roman senate offered to reward her as she pleased. She only asked to raise a temple to the goddess of female fortune, which was done on the very spot where she had pacified her son. Liv. 2, c. 40.—Dionys. Hal. 7, &c.

Vetūrius, Vid. Mamurius, a consul defeated by the Samnites, and obliged to pass under the yoke with great ignominy.

Vetus, L. a Roman, who proposed to open a communication between the Mediterranean and the German ocean, by means of a canal. He was put to death by order of Nero.

Vibius, a Roman who refused to pay any attention to Cicero when banished, though he had received from him the most unbounded favours.

Victor, Sext. Aurelius, a writer in the age of Constantius. He gave the world a concise history of the Roman emperors, from the age of Augustus to his own time, or A. D. 360. He also wrote an abridgment of the Roman history before the age of Julius Cæsar, which is now extant, and ascribed by different authors to C. Nepos, to Tacitus, Suetonius, Pliny, &c. Victor was greatly esteemed by the emperors, and honoured with the consulship. The best editions of Victor are that of Pitiscus, 8vo. Utr. 1696, and that of Artuzenius, 4to. Amst. 1733.

Victorīna, a celebrated matron who placed herself at the head of the Roman armies, and made war against the emperor Gallienus. Her son Victorinus, and her grandson of the same name, were declared emperors; but when they were assassinated, Victorina invested with the imperial purple one of her favourites called Tetricus. She was some time after poisoned, A. D. 269, and, according to some, by Tetricus himself.

Victorīnus, a Christian writer, who composed a worthless epic poem on the death of the seven children mentioned in the Maccabees, and distinguished himself more by the active part he took in his writings against the Arians.

Villia Lex, annalis or annaria, by L. Villius the tribune, A. U. C. 574, defined the proper age required for exercising the office of a magistrate, 25 years for the quæstorship, 27 or 28 for the edileship or tribuneship, for the office of prætor 30, and for that of consul 43. Liv. 11, c. 44.

Vincentius, one of the Christian fathers, A. D. 434, whose works are best edited by Baluzius, Paris, 1669.

Vindex Julius, a governor of Gaul, who revolted against Nero, and determined to deliver the Roman empire from his tyranny. He was followed by a numerous army, but at last defeated by one of the emperor's generals. When he perceived that all was lost, he laid violent hands upon himself, 68. A. D. Sueton. in Galb. —Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 51.—Plin. 9, ep. 19.

Vindicius, a slave, who discovered the conspiracy which some of the most noble of the Roman citizens had formed to restore Tarquin to his throne. He was amply rewarded, and made a citizen of Rome. Liv. 2, c. 5.—Plut. in Popl.

Vinnius, Asella, a servant of Horace, to whom

ap. 13 is addressed as injunctions how to deliver to Augustus some poems from his master.

VIPSANIA, a daughter of M. Agrippa, mother of Drusus. She was the only one of Agrippa's daughters who died a natural death. She was married to Tiberius when a private man, and when she had been repudiated, she married Asinius Gallus. Tacit. A. 1, c. 12, l. 3, c. 19.

VIRGILIUS MARO, PUBL. There exist but few authentic materials from which we can collect any circumstances concerning the life of his poet. We possess only some scattered remarks of ancient commentators or grammarians, and a Life by Donatus, of very dubious authority. It appears that Virgil's father was a man of low birth, and that, at one period of his life, he was engaged in the meanest employments. According to some authorities, he was a potter or brick-maker; and according to others, the hireling of a travelling merchant, called Magus or Maius. He so ingratiated himself, however, with his master, that he received his daughter Maia in marriage, and was intrusted with the charge of a farm, which his father-in-law had acquired in the vicinity of Mantua. Our poet was the offspring of these humble parents; and was born in the year of Rome 684, at the village of Andes (now Pietola), which lies at a few miles' distance from Mantua. The cradle of illustrious men, like the origin of celebrated nations, has been frequently surrounded with the marvellous. Hence, the dream of his mother Maia, that she had brought forth a branch of laurel, and the prodigy of the swarm of bees which lighted on the lips of the infant. The studies of Virgil commenced at Cremona, where he remained till he assumed the toga virilis; and to this day the inhabitants of Cremona pretend to show a house, in the street of St. Bartholomew, in which Virgil resided when a youth. At the age of sixteen, he removed to Milan, and shortly afterwards to Naples, where he laid the foundation of that multifarious learning which shines so conspicuously in the Æneid, and which he employed with such judgment, as richly to merit the eulogy of Macrobius—'Virgilius quem nullius unquam disciplinæ error involvit." During his residence in this city, he perused the most celebrated Greek writers, being instructed in their language and literature by Parthenius Nicenus, well known as the author of a collection of amatory tales, which he wrote for the use of Cornelius Gallus, in order to furnish him with materials for elegies and other poems. Virgil likewise carefully read the Greek historians, particularly Thucydides, and he studied the Epicurean system of philosophy under Syro, a celebrated teacher of that sect. But medicine and mathematics were the sciences to which he was chiefly addicted; and to this early tincture of geometrical knowledge may, perhaps, in some degree, be ascribed his ideas of luminous order and masterly arrangement, and that regularity of thought, as well as exactness of expression, by which all his writings are distinguished. The battle of Modena was fought in 711, and the triumvirate, having been shortly afterwards formed, Vedius Pollio was appointed, on the part of Antony, to the command of the district in which the farm of Virgil lay. Pollio, who was a noted extortioner, levied enormous contributions from the inhabitants of the territory intrusted to his care; and in some instances, when the pecuniary supplies failed, he drove the ancient colonists from their lands, and settled his veterans in their place. He was fond, however, of poetry, and was a generous protector of literary men. The rising genius of Virgil had now begun to manifest itself. His poetic talents, and amiable manners, recommended him to the favour of Pollio; and so long as that chief continued in the command of the Mantuan district, he was relieved from all exaction, and protected in the peaceable possession of his property. But the tranquillity which he enjoyed under the protection of Pollio was of short duration. Previously to the battle of Philippi, the triumvirs had promised to their soldiers the land belonging to some of the richest towns in the empire. Cremona had unfortunately espoused the cause of Brutus, and thus peculiarly incurred the vengeance of the victorious party. But as its territory was not found adequate to contain the veteran soldiers of the triumvirs, amongst whom it had been divided, the deficiency was supplied from the neighbouring district of Mantua, in which the farm of Virgil lay. Pollio, being a zealous partisan of Antony, and supporting the party of his brother and Fulvia, who unsuccessfully opposed the division of the lands, had it probably no longer in his power to protect Virgil from the aggressions of the soldiery. He was dispossessed under circumstances of peculiar violence, and which even threatened danger to his personal safety; being compelled on one occasion, to escape from the fury of the centurion Arrius, by swimming the Mincius. He had the good fortune, however, to obtain the favour of Alphenus Varus, with whom he had studied philosophy at Naples, under Syro the Epicurean, and who now either succeeded Pollio in the command of the district, or was appointed by Augustus to superintend in that quarter the division of the lands. Under his protection Virgil twice repaired to Rome, where he was favourably received not only by Mæcenas, but Augustus himself, from whom he procured the restoration of the patrimony of which he had been deprived. This happened in the commencement of the year 714; and during the course of that season, in gratitude for the favours he had received, he composed his eclogue entitled Tityrus, in which he introduces two shepherds, one of whom laments the distraction of the times, and complains of the aggressions of the soldiery, while the other rejoices for the recovery of his farm, and promises ever to honour as a god the youth who had restored it. The situation of Virgil's residence was low and humid, and the climate chill at certain seasons of the year. His delicate constitution, and the pulmonary complaints with which he was affected, induced him, about the year 714 or 715, when he had reached the age of thirty, to seek a warmer sky. To this change, it may be conjectured, he was farther instigated by his increasing celebrity, and the extension of his poetic fame. His countrymen were captivated by the perfect novelty of pastoral composition, and by the successful boldness with which Virgil had transferred the sweet Sicilian strains to a language which, before his attempt, must have appeared, from its harshness and severity, but little adapted to be a vehicle for the softness of rural description, or the delicacy of amorous sentiment, and which had scarcely yet been polished or refined to the susceptibility of such smooth numbers as the pastoral muse demanded. The bucolics, accordingly, were relished and admired by all classes of his contemporaries. So universal was their popularity, that the philosophic eclogue of Silenus, soon after its composition, was publicly recited in the theatre by Cytheris, a celebrated mima, who was then the mistress of Antony and Cornelius Gallus, and who, in her earlier years, had touched the heart of Brutus. On quitting his paternal fields, Virgil first proceeded to the capital. Here his private fortune was considerably augmented by the liberality of Mæcenas; and such was the favour he possessed with his patron, that we find him, soon after his arrival at Rome, introducing Horace to the notice of the minister, and attending him, alone with that poet, on a political mission to Brundisium. At the period when Virgil enjoyed so much honour and popularity in the capital, Naples was a favourite retreat of illustrious and literary men—the "studio florentes ignobilis otî," who longed to prosecute in repose light and agreeable studies. There Virgil retired, about 717, when in the 33d year of his age; and he continued during the remainer of his life, to dwell chiefly in that city, or at a delightful villa which he possessed in the Campania Felix, in the neighbourhood of Nola, ten miles east from Naples,—leading a life which may be considered as happy, when compared with the fate of the other great epic poets, Homer, Tasso, and Milton, in whom the mind or the vision was darkened. About the time when he first went to reside at Naples, he commenced his Georgics, by order of Mæcenas, and continued, for the seven following years, closely occupied with the composition of that inimitable poem. During this long period, he was accustomed to dictate a number of verses in the morning, and to spend the rest of the day in revising and correcting them, or reducing them to a smaller number—comparing himself in this respect, to a she bear, which licks her misshapen offspring into proper form and proportion. It was not till he had finished this subject with unrivalled success that he presumed to write the Æneid. This poem, which occupied him till his death, was commenced in 724, the same year in which he had completed the Georgics. After he had been engaged for some time in its composition, the greatest curiosity and interest concerning it began to be felt at Rome. A work, it was generally believed, was in progress which would eclipse the fame of the Iliad; and the passage which describes the shield of Æneas, appears to have been seen by Propertius. Augustus himself at length became desirous to read the poem, so far as it had been carried; and, in the year 729, while absent from Rome on a military expedition against the Cantabrians, he wrote to the author from the extremity of his empire, intreating to be allowed a perusal of it. Macrobius had preserved one of Virgil's answers to Augustus:—"I have of late received from you frequent letters. With regard to my Æneas, if, by Hercules, it were worth your listening to, I should willingly send it. But so vast is the undertaking, that I almost appear to myself to have commenced such a work from some defect in judgment or understanding; especially since, as you know, other and far higher studies are required for such a performance." Having brought the Æneid to a conclusion, but not to the perfection which he wished to bestow on it, Virgil, contrary to the advice and wish of his friends, resolved to travel into Greece, that he might correct and polish this great production at leisure, in that land of poetic imagination. Virgil proceeded directly to Athens, where he commenced the revisal of his epic poem, and added the magnificent introduction to the third book of the Georgics.—He had been thus engaged for some months at Athens, when Augustus arrived in that city, on his return to Italy, from a progress through his eastern dominions. The arrival of Augustus, however, induced him to shorten his stay, and to embrace the opportunity of returning to Italy in the retinue of the emperor. But the hand of death was already upon him. From his youth he had been of a delicate constitution; and as age advanced, he was afflicted with frequent headaches, asthma, and spitting of blood. Even the climate of Naples could not preserve him from frequent attacks of these maladies, and their worst symptoms had increased during his residence in Greece. The vessel in which he embarked with the emperor, touched at Megara, where he was seized with great debility and languor. When he again went on board, his distemper was so increased by the motion and agitation of the vessel, that he expired a few days after he had landed at Brundisium, on the southeastern coast of Italy. His death happened in the year 734, when he was in the fifty-first year of his age. When he felt its near approach, he ordered his friends, Varius and Plotius Tucca, who were then with him, to burn the Æneid, as an imperfect poem. Augustus, however, interposed to save a work, which he no doubt foresaw would at once confer immortality on the poet, and on the prince who patronised him. It was accordingly intrusted to Varius and Tucca, with a power to revise and retrench, but with a charge that they should make no additions; a command which they so strictly observed, as not to complete even the hemistichs, which had been left imperfect. Virgil bequeathed the greater part of his wealth, which was considerable, to a brother. The remainder was divided among his patrons, Mæcenas and his friends Varius and Tucca. Before his death he had also commanded that his bones should be carried to Naples, where he had lived so long and so happily. This order was fulfilled under charge of Augustus himself. The excellence of Virgil's eclogues appears to have been regarded by his countrymen as precluding all attempts of a similar description, for no swains were taught, by any subsequent poet, to touch the rustic pipe till Calpurnius ventured his feeble efforts in the latest ages of Roman literature. The poem, entitled the Georgics, which, in succession of time, was the next work of Virgil, is as remarkable for majesty and magnificence of diction, as the eclogues are for sweetness and harmony of versification. It is the most complete, elaborate, and finished poem, in the Latin, or perhaps any other language; and though the choice of subject, and the situations, afforded less expectation of success than the pastorals, so much has been achieved by art and genius, that the author has chiefly exhibited himself as a poet on topics where it was most difficult to appear as such. Rome, from its local situation, was not well adapted for commerce; and from the time of Romulus to that of Cæsar, agriculture had been the chief care of the Romans. Its operations were conducted by the greatest statesmen, and its precepts inculcated by the profoundest scholars. The long continuance, however, and cruel ravages of the civil wars, had now occasioned an almost general desolation. Italy was, in a great measure, depopulated of its husbandmen. The soldiers by whom the lands were newly occupied, had too long ravaged the fields to think of cultivating them; and, in consequence of the farms lying waste, a famine and insurrection had nearly ensued. In these circumstances Mæcenas resolved, if possible, to revive the decayed spirit of agriculture, to recall the lost habits of peaceful industry, and to make rural improvement, as it had been in former times, the prevailing amusement among the great: and he wisely judged, that no method was so likely to contribute to these important objects, as a recommendation of agriculture by all the insinuating charms of poetry. At his suggestion, accordingly, Virgil commenced his Georgics, which was thus in some degree undertaken from a political motive, and with a view to promote the welfare of his country. But though written with a patriotic object—by order of a Roman statesman—and on a subject peculiarly Roman, the imitative spirit of Latin poetry still prevailed, and the author could not avoid recurring even in his Georgics to a Grecian model. A few verses on the signs and prognostics of weather have been translated from the Phænomena of Aratus. But the Works and Days of Hesiod is the pattern which he has chiefly held in view. In reference to his imitation of this model, he himself stiles his Georgics an Ascræan poem; and he appears, indeed, to have been a sincere admirer of the ancient bard. We come now to the Æneid, a work which belongs to a nobler class of poetry than the Georgics, and is perhaps equally perfect in its kind. It ranks, indeed, in the very highest order, and it was in this exalted species that Virgil was most fitted to excel. No one who has read the Æneid, and studied the historical character of Augustus, or the early events of his reign, can doubt that Æneas is an allegorical representation of that emperor. Warburton has attempted to prove, in his Divine Legation of Moses, that the descent of Æneas to the infernal regions is a figurative description of an initiation into the Eleusinian mysteries. The author has, no doubt, pursued the allegory too far, and has wrought up some fanciful coincidences. But in many steps of the hero's progress through the three estates of the dead, he has successfully shown the exact conformity of his adventures with the trials undergone by the initiated. Now, it is matter of historical record, that, during a residence at Athens, Augustus passed through all the mysteries and ceremonies which the Grecian priesthood had instituted, to confirm the doctrine of a future state of rewards and punishments; but he highly respected the secrecy of these rites, and hence Virgil was obliged to cover the whole with a thick veil of allegory. Turnus is Antony. It is remarkable, that during the most abject age of court flattery, a certain tenderness was shown by the Latin poets towards the character of this implacable but Roman enemy of Augustus. This feeling is observable in the writings of Horace, who, in his political odes, casts all the odium on Cleopatra, but spares her infatuated lover. In like manner, none of the darker shades of disposition are thrown into the character of Turnus. He is represented as a bold though somewhat rude warrior, and an ardent lover; and his defects are concealed, as those of Antony in some degree were, by frankness, generosity, and the lustre of a daring courage. Evander, the ancient friend of Anchises, and ally of Æneas, typifies the old Cæsareans who joined the party of Augustus against Antony; Achates is Agrippa; Lavinia—Livia; Latinus—Lepidus; and the furious Amata is Fulvia, who, by her turbulent spirit, incensed the people against Cæsar, and excited the Perugian war. We should be sorry to think that Virgil meant to represent Cicero by the wretched declaimer Drances; but his enmity to Turnus, who is Antony, gives plausibility to the conjecture. The features of his character may not correspond with those of Cicero's, but they have some analogy to those which the calumnies of the age attributed to him. Besides the well-known and authentic works of Virgil, several poems still exist, which are very generally ascribed to him, but which, from their inferiority, are supposed to be the productions of his early youth. Of these the longest is the Culex, which has been translated by Spenser, under the title of Virgil's Gnat. There can be no doubt, from two epigrams of Martial, that there was a poem called Culex, which had been written by Virgil. But it may be questioned if the Culex, to which Martial alludes, be the same with the poem under that name which we now possess. The Culex, which still appears in some of the editions of Virgil, is not without passages of considerable merit, but it exhibits few marks of the taste and judgment of Virgil. The subject of the Culex may be considered as partly pastoral and partly mock heroic; but the mockery is of a gentle and delicate description, and much real beauty and tenderness break out amid the assumed solemnity. By far the finest, and probably the most genuine, passage of the poem, is that near the beginning, in which the author describes the goatherd leading out his flocks to their pasture, and in which he descants on the pleasures of a country life. As amended by Heyne, and cleared from the interpolations of the scholiasts, we may find in it the germe of those flowers of song, which afterwards expanded to such maturity and perfection in the Georgics. The Ciris, a poem of the same doubtful authenticity with the Culex, and which some commentators have attributed to Cornelius Gallus, records the well-known mythological fable of Scylla, daughter of Nisus; who, having become enamoured of Minos, the enemy of her father, cut off from her parent's head the fatal lock which preserved his kingdom. In detestation of the act, Minos, on his voyage home from Crete to Megara, fastened her to the side of his vessel, and thus dragged her along through the sea, to the utter amazement of Tethys and the seanymphs, who betray much curiosity on the occasion. She is at length relieved by her transformation into the bird called Ciris, from which the poem derives its title. From the Ciris, Spenser, who had translated the Culex, imitated a long passage, which constitutes part of the Legend of Britomart, in the third book of the Fairy Queen. The conversations between Britomart and her nurse Glauce, who presses her to reveal the object of her passion, as also the incantations employed by the beldam, correspond closely with the discourse between Scylla and Carme, and the enchantments of the latter. The Moretum would certainly be a curious and interesting production, could it be authenticated as the work of Virgil, or even of Septimius Serenus, to whom Wernsdorff has ascribed it, and who flourished at Rome during the reigns of the Flavian family. Its subject is one concerning which few relics have descended to us from antiquity. It gives an account of the occupations and everyday life of an Italian peasant, and, so far as it goes, every thing is related with the greatest minuteness; but the employments only of the morning are recorded. The Copa merely contains an invitation from a hostess, who was a native of Syria, to pass the hours merrily in a place of entertainment which she kept beyond the gates of Rome: but a good-humoured drinking song, by the majestic author of the Georgics and Æneid, is in itself a curiosity. A few of the lines, though some barbarisms of expressions occur, are also written with considerable spirit, and present not an uninteresting picture of the manners that prevailed in those hostels which stood beyond the walls of the city, on the banks of the Tiber or shore of Ostia. We here learn what were the usual preparations of a Syrian hostess two thousand years ago on the banks of the Tiber; and it is said, that, at this day, the bread and the wine, the mulberries, grapes, vine leaves, and chestnuts, are the ordinary luxuries and enjoyments of similar places of entertainment now existing in Italy. Among the very numerous and excellent editions of Virgil, these few may be collected as the best; that of Masvicius, 2 vols, 4to. Leovardiae, 1717; Baskerville, 4to. Birmingham, 1757; of the Variorum, in 8vo. L. Bat. 1661; of Heyne, 4 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1767; of Edinburgh, 2 vols. 12mo. 1755; and of Glasgow, 12mo. 1758.——II. Caius, a prætor of Sicily, who, when Cicero was banished, refused to receive the exiled orator, though his friend, for fear of the resentment of Clodius. Cic. ad Q. Frater.

Virginia, a daughter of the centurion L. Virginius. Appius Claudius, the decemvir, became enamoured of her, and attempted to remove her from the place where she resided. She was claimed by one of his favourites as the daughter of a slave, and Appius, in the capacity and with the authority of judge, had pronounced the sentence, and delivered her into the hands of his friend, when Virginius, informed of his violent proceedings, arrived from the camp. The father demanded to see his daughter, and when this request was granted, he snatched a knife and plunged it into Virginia's breast, exclaiming, This is all, my dearest daughter, I can give thee, to preserve thy chastity from the lust and violence of a tyrant. No sooner was the blow given, than Virginius ran to the camp with the bloody knife in his hand. The soldiers were astonished and incensed, not against the murderer, but the tyrant that was the cause of Virginia's death, and they immediately marched to Rome. Appius was seized, but he destroyed himself in prison, and prevented the execution of the law. Spurius Oppius, another of the decemvirs, who had not opposed the tyrant's views, killed himself also; and Marcus Claudius, the favourite of Appius, was put to death, and the decemviral power abolished, about 449 years before Christ. Liv. 3, c. 44, &c.—Juv. 10, v. 294.

Virginius, I. the father of Virginia, made tribune of the people. Vid. Virginia.——II. A tribune of the people, who accused Q. Cæso, the son of Cincinnatus. He increased the number of the tribunes to ten, and distinguished himself by his seditions against the patricians.——III. Another tribune, in the age of Camillus, fined for his opposition to a law which proposed going to Veii.——IV. Caius, a prætor of Sicily, who opposed the entrance of Cicero into his province, though under many obligations to the orator. Some read Virgilius.——V. One of the generals of Nero in Germany. He made war against Vindex, and conquered him. He was treated with great coldness by Galba, whose interest he had supported with so much success. He refused all dangerous stations, and, though twice offered the imperial purple, he rejected it with disdain. Plut.

Viriathus, a mean shepherd of Lusitania, who gradually rose to power, and by first heading a gang of robbers, saw himself at last followed by a numerous army. He made war against the Romans with uncommon success, and for 14 years enjoyed the envied title of protector of public liberty in the provinces of Spain. Many generals were defeated, and Pompey himself was ashamed to find himself beaten. Cæpio was at last sent against him. But his despair of conquering him by force of arms, obliged him to have recourse to artifice, and he had the meanness to bribe the servants of Viriathus to murder their master, B. C. 40. Flor. 2, c. 17.—Val. Max. 6, c. 4.—Liv. 52 and 54.

Viridomarus, a young man of great power among the Ædui. Cæsar greatly honoured him, but he fought at last against the Romans. Cæs. Bell. G. 7, c. 39, &c.

Vitellius Aulus, I. a Roman, raised by his vices to the throne. He was descended from one of the most illustrious families of Rome, and as such he gained an easy admission to the palace of the emperors. The greatest part of his youth was spent at Capreæ, where his willingness and compliance to gratify the most vicious propensities of Tiberius, raised his father to the dignity of consul and governor of Syria. The applause he gained in this school of debauchery was too flattering to allow Vitellius to alter his conduct, and no longer to be one of the votaries of vice. Caligula was pleased with his skill in driving a chariot. Claudius loved him because he was a great gamester, and he recommended himself to the favours of Nero by wishing him to sing publicly in the crowded theatre. He did not fall with his patrons, like the other favourites, but the death of an emperor seemed to raise him to greater honours. He passed through all the honours of the state, and gained the soldiery by donations and liberal promises. He was at the head of the Roman legions in Germany when Otho was proclaimed emperor, and the exaltation of his rival was no sooner heard in the camp, than he was likewise invested with the purple by his soldiers. He accepted with pleasure the dangerous office, and instantly marched against Otho. Three battles were fought, and in all Vitellius was conquered. A fourth, however, in the plains between Mantua and Cremona left him master of the field and of the Roman empire. Vitellius feasted four or five times a day. The most celebrated of his feasts was that with which he was treated by his brother Lucius. The table, among other meats, was covered with two thousand different dishes of fish, and seven thousand of fowls; and so expensive was he in every thing, that above seven millions sterling were spent in maintaining his table in the space of four months; and Josephus has properly observed, that if Vitellius had reigned long, the great opulence of all the Roman empire would have been found insufficient to defray the expenses of his banquets. This extravagance, which delighted the favourites, soon raised the indignation of the people. Vespasian was proclaimed emperor by the army, and his minister Primus was sent to destroy the imperial glutton. Vitellius concealed himself under the bed of the porter of his palace, but this obscure retreat betrayed him; he was dragged naked through the streets, his hands were tied behind his back, and a drawn sword was placed under his chin to make him lift his head. After suffering the greatest insults from the populace, he was at last carried to the place of execution, and put to death with repeated blows. His head was cut off and fixed to a pole, and his mutilated body dragged with a hook and thrown into the Tiber, A. D. 69, after a reign of one year, except 12 days. Suet.—Tacit. Hist. 2.—Eutrop. —Dio.—Plut.——II. Lucius, the father of the emperor, obtained great honours by his flattery to the emperors. He was made governor of Syria, and in this distant province he obliged the Parthians to sue for peace. His adulation to Messalina, is well known, and he obtained, as a particular favour, the honourable office of pulling off the shoes of the empress. Suet. ——III. Publius, an uncle of the emperor of that name. He was accused under Nero of attempts to bribe the people with money from the treasury against the emperor. He killed himself before his trial.——IV. A son of the emperor Vitellius, put to death by one of his father's friends.——Some of the family of the Vitellii conspired with the Aquilii and other illustrious Romans, to restore Tarquin to his throne. Their conspiracy was discovered by the consuls, and they were severely punished. Plut.

Vitruvius, M. Pollio, a celebrated architect in the age of Augustus, born at Formiæ. He is known only by his writings, and nothing is recorded in history of his life or private character. He wrote a treatise on his profession, which he dedicated to Augustus, and it is the only book on architecture, now extant, written by the ancients. In this work he shows that he was master of his profession. The best edition of Vitruvius is that of De Laet, Amst. 1649.

Ulpianus Domitius, a lawyer in the reign of Alexander Severus, of whom he became the secretary and principal minister. He raised a persecution against the Christians, and was at last murdered by the prætorian guards, of which he had the command, A. D. 226. There are some fragments of his compositions on civil law still extant. The Greek commentaries of Ulpian on Demosthenes were printed in fol. 1527, apud Aldum.

Ulysses, a king of the islands of Ithaca and Dulichium, son of Anticlea and Laertes, or, according to some, of Sisyphus. Vid. Sisyphus and Anticlea. He became, like the other princes of Greece, one of the suiters of Helen; but as he despaired of success in his applications, on account of the great number of his competitors, he solicited the hand of Penelope, the daughter of Icarius. The rape of Helen, however, by Paris, did not long permit him to remain in his kingdom, and as he was bound to defend her against every intruder, he was summoned to the war with the other princes of Greece. Pretending to be insane, not to leave his beloved Penelope, he yoked a horse and a bull together, and ploughed the seashore, where he sowed salt instead of corn. This dissimulation was soon discovered, and Palamedes, by placing before the plough of Ulysses, his infant son Telemachus, convinced the world that the father was not mad who had the providence to turn away the plough from the furrow not to hurt his child. Ulysses was therefore obliged to go to the war, but he did not forget him who had discovered his pretended insanity. Vid. Palamedes. During the Trojan war, the king of Ithaca was courted for his superior prudence and sagacity. By his means Achilles was discovered among the daughters of Lycomedes, king of Scyros, (Vid. Achilles,) and Philoctetes was induced to abandon Lemnos, and to fight the Trojans with the arrows of Hercules. Vid. Philoctetes. He was not less distinguished for his activity and valour. With the assistance of Diomedes, he murdered Rhesus, and slaughtered the sleeping Thracians in the midst of their camp, (Vid. Rhesus and Dolon,) and he introduced himself into the city of Priam, and carried away the Palladium of the Trojans. Vid. Palladium. For these eminent services he was universally applauded by the Greeks, and he was rewarded with the arms of Achilles, which Ajax had disputed with him. After the Trojan war, Ulysses embarked on board his ships to return to Greece, but he was exposed to a number of misfortunes before he reached his native country. He was thrown by the winds upon the coasts of Africa, and visited the country of the Lotophagi, and of the Cyclops in Sicily. Polyphemus, who was the king of the Cyclops, seized Ulysses with his companions, five of whom he devoured, (Vid. Polyphemus,) but the prince of Ithaca intoxicated him and put out his eye, and at last escaped from the dangerous cave where he was confined, by tying himself under the belly of the sheep of the Cyclops when led to pasture. In Æolia he met with a friendly reception, and Æolus gave him confined in bags, all the winds which could obstruct his return to Ithaca, but the curiosity of his companions to know what the bags contained, proved nearly fatal. The winds rushed with impetuosity, and all the fleet was destroyed except the ship which carried Ulysses. From thence he was thrown upon the coasts of the Læstrigones, and of the island Ææa, where the magician Circe changed all his companions into pigs for their voluptuousness. He escaped their fate by means of an herb which he had received from Mercury, and after he had obliged the magician by force of arms to restore his companions to their original shape, he yielded to her charms, and made her mother of Telegonus. He visited the infernal regions, and consulted Tiresius how to regain his country in safety; and, after he had received every necessary information, he returned on earth. He passed along the coasts of the Sirens unhurt, by the directions of Circe, (Vid. Sirenes,) and escaped the whirlpools and shoals of Scylla and Charybdis. On the coasts of Sicily, his companions stole and killed some oxen that were sacred to Apollo, for which the god destroyed the ships, and all were drowned except Ulysses, who saved himself on a plank, and swam to the island of Calypso, in Ogygia. There, for seven years, he forgot Ithaca, in the arms of the goddess, by whom he had two children. The gods at last interfered, and Calypso, by order of Mercury, suffered him to depart after she had furnished him with a ship, and every thing requisite for a voyage. He had almost reached the island of Corcyra, when Neptune, still mindful that his son Polyphemus had been robbed of his sight by the perfidy of Ulysses, raised a storm and sunk his ship. Ulysses swam with difficulty to the island of the Phæacians, where the kindness of Nausica, and the humanity of her father, King Alcinous, entertained him for a while. He related the series of his misfortunes to the monarch, and at last, by his benevolence, he was conducted in a ship to Ithaca. The Phæacians laid him on the seashore as he was asleep, and Ulysses found himself safely restored to his country, after a long absence of 20 years. He was well informed that his palace was besieged by a number of suiters, who continually disturbed the peace of Penelope, and therefore he assumed the habit of a beggar, by the advice of Minerva, and made himself known to his son, and his faithful shepherd Eumæus. With them he took measures to re-establish himself on his throne; he went to the palace, and was personally convinced of the virtues and of the fidelity of Penelope. Before his arrival was publicly known, all the importuning suiters were put to death, and Ulysses restored to the peace and bosom of his family. Vid. Laertes, Penelope, Telemachus, Eumæus. He lived about sixteen years after his return, and was at last killed by his son Telegonus, who had landed in Ithaca with the hopes of making himself known to his father. This unfortunate event had been foretold to him by Tiresias, who assured him that he should die by the violence of something that was to issue from the bosom of the sea. Vid. Telegonus. According to some authors, Ulysses went to consult the oracle of Apollo, after his return to Ithaca, and he had the meanness to seduce Erippe, the daughter of a king of Epirus, who had treated him with great kindness. Erippe had a son by him whom she called Euryalus. When come to years of puberty, Euryalus was sent to Ithaca by his mother; but when Ulysses returned, he put to immediate death his unknown son, on the crimination of Penelope, his wife, who accused him of attempts upon her virtue. The adventures of Ulysses, on his return to Ithaca from the Trojan war, are the subject of Homer's Odyssey. Homer. Il. & Od.—Virg. Æn. 2, 3, &c. —Dictys Cret. 1, &c.—*Ovid. UNDECEMVIRI, magistrates at Athens, to whom such as were publicly condemned were delivered to be executed. C. Nep. in Phoc.

VŌCŌNIA LEX, de testamentis, by Q. Voconius Saxa, the tribune, A. U. C. 584, enacted that no woman should be left heiress to an estate, and that no rich person should leave by his will more than the fourth part of his fortune to a woman. This step was taken to prevent the decay of the noblest and most illustrious of the families of Rome. This law was abrogated by Augustus.

VOLOGĒSES, a name common to many of the kings of Parthia, who made war against the Roman emperors. Tacit. 12, Ann. 14.

VOLSCI. Vid. Part I.

VOLUMNIUS, (T.) I. a Roman, famous for his friendship towards M. Lucullus, whom M. Antony had put to death. His great lamentations were the cause that he was dragged to the triumvir, of whom he demanded to be conducted to the body of his friend, and there to be put to death. His request was easily granted. Liv. 124, c. 20.——II. An Etrurian, who wrote tragedies in his native language.——III. a consul, who defeated the Samnites and the Etrurians. Liv. 9.——IV. A friend of M. Brutus. He wrote an account of his death and of his actions, from which Plutarch selected some remarks.

VŌLŪSIUS, I. a poet of Patavia, who wrote, like Ennius, the annals of Rome in verse. Seneca, ep. 93.—Catull. 96, v. 7.——II. Saturninus, a governor of Rome, who died in the 93d year of his age, beloved and respected under Nero. Tacit. Ann. 13.

VOLUX, a son of Bacchus, whom the Romans defeated. Sylla suspected his fidelity. Sallust. Jug. 106.

VONŌNES, I. a king of Parthia, expelled by his subjects, and afterwards placed on the throne of Armenia. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 14. ——II. Another, king of Armenia.——III. A man made king of Parthia by Augustus.

VOPISCUS, a native of Syracuse, 303 A. D. who wrote the life of Aurelian, Tacitus, Florianus, Probus, Firmus, Carus, &c. He is one of the six authors who are called Historiæ Augustæ scriptores, but he excels all others in his style, although we look in vain for the purity of the Augustan age.

VOTIĒNUS MONTĀNUS, a man of learning, banished to one of the Baleares for his malevolent reflections upon Tiberius. Ovid has celebrated him as an excellent poet. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 42.

VULCANĀLIA, festivals in honour of Vulcan brought to Rome from Prænestę, and observed in the month of August. The streets were illuminated, fires kindled every where, and animals thrown into the flames, as a sacrifice to the deity. Varro. de L. L. 5.——Dion. Hal. 1.—Columell. 18.—Plin. 18, c. 13.

Vulcanius, Tarentianus, a Latin historian, who wrote an account of the life of the three Gordians, &c.

Vulcātius, I. a Roman knight, who conspired with Piso against Nero, &c. Tacit.——II. a senator in the reign of Diocletian, who attempted to write a history of all such as had reigned at Rome. Of his works nothing is extant but an account of Avidius Cassius, who revolted in the East during the reign of M. Aurelius, which some ascribe to Spartianus.

Vulso, I. a Roman consul who invaded Africa with Regulus.——II. Another consul. He had the provinces of Asia while in office, and triumphed over the Galatians.

X.

Xanthĭca, a festival observed by the Macedonians in the month called Xanthicus, the same as April. It was then usual to make a lustration of the army with great solemnity.

Xanthus, a Greek historian of Lydia, who wrote an account of his country, of which some fragments remain. Dionys. Hal.

Xantippe, the wife of Socrates, remarkable for her ill humour and peevish disposition, which are become proverbial. Some suppose that the philosopher was acquainted with her moroseness and insolence before he married her, and that he took her for his wife to try his patience, and inure himself to the malevolent reflections of mankind. She continually tormented him with her impertinence; and one day, not satisfied with using the most bitter invectives, she emptied a vessel of dirty water on his head, upon which the philosopher coolly observed, after thunder there generally falls rain. Elian. V. H. 7, c. 10, l. 9, c. 7, l. 11, c. 12.—Ving. in Socrat.

Xantippus, I. a Lacedæmonian general, who assisted the Carthaginians in the first Punic war. He defeated the Romans, 256 B. C. and took the celebrated Regulus prisoner. Such signal services deserved to be rewarded, but the Carthaginians looked with envious jealousy upon Xantippus, and he retired to Corinth after he had saved them from destruction. Some authors support that the Carthaginians ordered him to be assassinated, and his body to be thrown into the sea, as he was returning home; while others say that they had prepared a leaky ship to convey him to Corinth, which he artfully avoided. Liv. 18 and 28, c. 43.—Appian. de Bell.——II. An Athenian general, who defeated the Persian fleet at Mycale with Leotychides. A statue was erected to his honour in the citadel of Athens. He made some conquests in Thrace, and increased the power of Athens. He was father to the celebrated Pericles by Agariste the niece of Clisthenes, who expelled the Pisistratidæ from Athens. Paus. 3, c. 7, l. 8, c. 52.—III. A son of Pericles, who disgraced his father by his disobedience, his ingratitude, and extravagance. He died of the plague in the Peloponnesian war. Plut.

Xenarchus, I. a peripatetic philosopher of Seleucia, who taught at Alexandria and at Rome, and was intimate with Augustus. Strab. 14.——II. A prætor of the Achæan league, who wished to favour the interest of Perseus, king of Macedonia, against the Romans.

Xeniădes, a Corinthian, who went to buy Diogenes the cynic when sold as a slave. He asked him what he could do? upon which the Cynic answered, Command freemen. This noble answer so pleased Xeniades, that he gave the cynic his liberty, and intrusted him with the care and education of his children. Diog.—Gell. 2, c. 18.

Xenŏcles, a tragic writer, who obtained four times a poetical prize, in a contention in which Euripides was competitor, either through the ignorance or by the bribery of his judges. The names of his tragedies which obtained the victory, were Œdipus, Lycaon, Bacchæ, Athamas Satyricus, against the Alexander, Palamedes, Trojani, and Sisyphus Satyricus, of Euripides. His grandson bore also the name of Xenocles, and excelled in tragical compositions. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 8.

Xenocrătes, I. an ancient philosopher, born at Chalcedon, and educated in the school of Plato, whose friendship he gained and whose approbation he merited. Though of a dull and sluggish disposition, he supplied the defects of nature by unwearied attention and industry, and was at last found capable of succeeding in the school of Plato after Speusippus, about 339 years before Christ. He was remarkable as a disciplinarian, and he required that his pupils should be acquainted with mathematics before they came under his care, and he even rejected some who had not the necessary qualification, saying that they had not yet found the key of philosophy. He did not only recommend himself to his pupils by precepts, but more powerfully by example; and since the wonderful change he had made upon the conduct of one of his auditors, (Vid. Polemon,) his company was as much shunned by the dissolute and extravagant, as it was courted by the virtuous and the benevolent. Philip of Macedon attempted to gain his confidence with money, but with no success. Alexander in this imitated his father, and sent some of his friends with 50 talents for the philosopher. They were introduced, and supped with Xenocrates. The repast was small, frugal, and elegant without ostentation. On the morrow, the officers of Alexander wished to pay down the 50 talents, but the philosopher asked them whether they had not perceived from the entertainment of the preceding day, that he was not in want of money: Tell your master, said he, to keep his money, he has more people to maintain than I have. Yet, not to offend the monarch, he accepted a small sum, about the 200th part of one talent. His character was not less conspicuous in every other particular, and he has been cited as an instance of virtue from the following circumstance: Lais had pledged herself to forfeit an immense sum of money if she did not triumph over the virtue of Xenocrates. She tried every art, but in vain; and she declared at last that she had not lost her money, as she had pledged herself to conquer a human being, not a lifeless stone. Though so respected and admired, yet Xenocrates was poor, and he was dragged to prison because he was unable to pay a small tribute to the state. He was delivered from confinement by one of his friends. His integrity was so well known, that when he appeared in the court as a witness, the judges dispensed with his oath. He died B. C. 314, in his 82d year, after he had presided in the academy for above 25 years. It is said that he fell in the night with his head into a basin of water, and that he was suffocated. He had written above 60 treatises on different subjects, all now lost. He acknowledged no other deity but heaven and the seven planets.—Diog.—Cic. ad Attic. 10, ep. 1, &c. Tusc. 5, c. 32.—Val. Max. 2, c. 10.—Lucian.——II. A physician in the age of Nero, not in great esteem. His Greek treatise, de alimento ex aquatilibus, is best edited by Franzius, Lips. 8vo. 1774.

Xenophănes, I. a Greek philosopher of Colophon, disciple of Archelaus, B. C. 535. He wrote several poems and treatises, and founded a sect which was called the Eleatic, in Sicily. Wild in his opinions about astronomy, he supposed that the stars were extinguished every morning and rekindled at night; that eclipses were occasioned by the temporary extinction of the sun; that the moon was inhabited, and 18 times bigger than the earth; and that there were several suns and moons for the convenience of the different climates of the earth. He further imagined that God and the world were the same, and he credited the eternity of the universe; but his incoherent opinion about the divinity raised the indignation of his countrymen, and he was banished. He died very poor when about 100 years old. Cic. quæst. 4, c. 37, de Div. 1, c. 3, de Nat. D. 1, c. 11.—Lactant. Div. Inst. 3, c. 23.——II. One of the ministers of Philip, who went to Annibal's camp, and made a treaty of alliance between Macedonia and Carthage.

Xenophĭlus, a Pythagorean philosopher, who lived to his 170th year, and enjoyed all his faculties to the last. He wrote upon music, and thence he was called the musician. Lucian. de Macrob.—Plin. 7, c. 50.—Val. Max. 8, c. 13.

Xenŏphon, I. an Athenian, son of Gryllus, celebrated as a general, an historian, and a philosopher. In the school of Socrates he received those instructions and precepts which afterwards so eminently distinguished him at the head of an army, in literary solitude, and as the father of a family. He was invited by Proxenus, one of his intimate friends, to accompany Cyrus the younger in an expedition against his brother Artaxerxes, king of Persia; but he refused to comply without previously consulting his venerable master, and inquiring into the propriety of such a measure. Socrates strongly opposed it, and observed, that it might raise the resentment of his countrymen, as Sparta had made an alliance with the Persian monarch; but, however, before he proceeded further, he advised him to consult the oracle of Apollo. Xenophon paid due deference to the injunctions of Socrates, but as he was ambitious of glory, and eager to engage in a distant expedition, he hastened with precipitation to Sardis, where he was introduced to the young prince, and treated with great attention. In the army of Cyrus, Xenophon showed that he was a true disciple of Socrates, and that he had been educated in the warlike city of Athens. After the decisive battle in the plains of Cunaxa, and the fall of young Cyrus, the prudence and vigour of his mind were called into action. The ten thousand Greeks who had followed the standard of an ambitious prince, were now at the distance of above 600 leagues from their native home, in a country surrounded on every side by a victorious enemy, without money, without provisions, and without a leader. Xenophon was selected from among the officers to superintend the retreat of his countrymen, and though he was often opposed by malevolence and envy, yet his persuasive eloquence and his activity convinced the Greeks, that no general could extricate them from every difficulty better than the disciple of Socrates. This celebrated retreat was at last happily effected; the Greeks returned home after a march of 1155 parasangs, or leagues, which was performed in 215 days, after an absence of 15 months. Tho whole perhaps might now be forgotten, or at least but obscurely known, if the great philosopher who planned it, had not employed his pen in describing the dangers which he escaped, and the difficulties which he surmounted. He was no sooner returned from Cunaxa, than he sought new honours in following the fortune of Agesilaus in Asia. He enjoyed his confidence, he fought under his standard, and conquered with him in the Asiatic provinces, as well as at the battle of Coronæa. His fame, however, did not escape the aspersions of jealousy; he was publicly banished from Athens for accompanying Cyrus against his brother, and being now without a home, he retired to Scillus, a small town of the Lacedæmonians, in the neighbourhood of Olympia. In this solitary retreat he dedicated his time to literary pursuits, and as he had acquired riches in his Asiatic expeditions, he began to adorn and variegate by the hand of art, for his pleasure and enjoyment, the country which surrounded Scillus. He built a magnificent temple to Diana, in imitation of that of Ephesus, and spent part of his time in rural employments, or in hunting in the woods and mountains. His peaceful occupations, however, were soon disturbed: a war arose between the Lacedæmonians and Elis; the sanctity of Diana's temple, and the venerable age of the philosopher, who lived in the delightful retreats of Scillus, were disregarded; and Xenophon, driven by the Æliens from his favourite spot, where he had composed and written for the information of posterity and honour of his country, retired to the city of Corinth. In this place he died, in the 90th year of his age, 359 years before the Christian era. The works of Xenophon are numerous; he wrote an account of the expedition of Cyrus, called the Anabasis, and as he had no inconsiderable share in the enterprise, his descriptions must be authentic, as he was himself an eyewitness. Many, however, have accused him of partiality. His Cyropædia, divided into eight books, has given rise to much criticism; and while some warmly maintain that it is a faithful account of the life and the actions of Cyrus the Great, and declare that it is supported by the authority of scripture, others as vehemently deny its authenticity. According to the opinions of Plato and of Cicero, the Cyropædia of Xenophon was a moral romance, and they support, that the historian did not so much write what Cyrus had been, as what every good and virtuous monarch ought to be. His Hellenica were written as a continuation of the history of Thucydides; and in his Memorabilia of Socrates, and in his Apology, he has shown himself, as Valerius Maximus observes, a perfect master of the philosophy of that great man. These are the most famous of his compositions, besides which there are other small tracts; his eulogium given on Agesilaus, his œconomics on the duties of domestic life, the dialogue entitled Hiero, in which he happily describes and compares the misery which attended the tyrant with the felicity of a virtuous prince; a treatise on hunting, the symposium of the philosophers, on the government of Athens and Sparta, a treatise on the revenues of Attica, &c. The simplicity and the elegance of Xenophon's diction have procured him the name of the Athenian muse and the bee of Greece; and they have induced Quintilian to say, that the graces dictated his language, and that the goddess of persuasion dwelt upon his lips. His sentiments, as to the divinity and religion, were the same as those of the venerable Socrates; he supported the immortality of the soul, and exhorted his friends to cultivate those virtues which insure the happiness of mankind with all the zeal and fervour of a Christian. He has been quoted as an instance of tenderness and resignation to providence. As he was offering a sacrifice, he was informed that Gryllus, his eldest son, had been killed at the battle of Mantinea. Upon this he tore the garland from his head; but when he was told that his son had died like a Greek, and had given a mortal wound to Epaminondas, the enemy's general, he replaced the flowers on his head, and continued the sacrifice, exclaiming that the pleasure he derived from the valour of his son was greater than the grief which his unfortunate death occasioned. The best editions of Xenophon are those of Leunclavius, fol. Francof. 1596; of Ernesti, 4 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1763; and the Glasgow edition, 12mo. of the Cyropædia, 1767; the expedition of Cyrus, 1764; the Memorabilia, 1761; and the history of Greece, 1762; and likewise the edition of Zeunius, published at Leipsic, in 8vo. in 6 vols. between the years 1778 and 1791. Cic. in Orat. 19.—*Val. A physician of the emperor Claudius, born in the island of Cos, and said to be descended from the Asclepiades. He enjoyed the emperor's favours, and through him the people of Cos were exempt from all taxes. He had the meanness to poison his benefactor at the instigation of Agrippina. Tacit. 12, Ann. c. 61 and 67.

Xerxes, I. succeeded his father Darius on the throne of Persia, and though but the second son of the monarch, he was preferred to his elder brother, Artabazanes. The causes alleged for this preference were, that Artabazanes was the son of Darius when a private man, and that Xerxes was born after his father had been raised on the Persian throne, of Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus. Xerxes continued the warlike preparations of his father, and added the revolted kingdom of Egypt to his extensive possessions. He afterwards invaded Europe, and entered Greece with an army, which, together with the numerous retinue of servants, eunuchs, and women, that attended it, amounted to no less than 5,283,220 souls. This multitude was stopped at Thermopylæ, by the valour of 300 Spartans under King Leonidas. Xerxes, astonished that such a handful of men should dare to oppose his progress, ordered some of his soldiers to bring them alive into his presence; but for three successive days the most valiant of the Persian troops were repeatedly defeated in attempting to execute the monarch's injunctions, and the courage of the Spartans might perhaps have triumphed longer, if a Trachinian had not led a detachment to the top of the mountain, and suddenly fallen upon the devoted Leonidas. The king himself nearly perished upon this occasion; and it has been reported, that in the night, the desperate Spartans sought, for a while, the royal tent, which they found deserted, and wandered through the Persian army, slaughtering thousands before them. The battle of Thermopylæ was the beginning of the disgrace of Xerxes; the more he advanced, it was to experience new disappointments, his fleet was defeated at Artemisium and Salamis, and though he burnt the deserted city of Athens, and trusted to the artful insinuations of Themistocles, yet he found his millions unable to conquer a nation that was superior to him in the knowledge of war and maritime affairs. Mortified with the ill success of his expedition, and apprehensive of imminent danger in the enemy's country, Xerxes hastened to Persia, and in 30 days he marched over all that territory which before he had passed, with much pomp and parade, in the space of six months. Mardonius, the best of his generals, was left behind with an army of 300,000 men, and the rest that had survived the ravages of war, of famine, and pestilence, followed their timid monarch into Thrace. When he reached the Hellespont, Xerxes found the bridge of boats which he had erected there totally destroyed by the storms, and he crossed the straits in a small fishing vessel. Restored to his kingdom and safety, he forgot his dangers, his losses, and his defeats, and gave himself up to riot and debauchery. His indolence and luxurious voluptuousness offended his subjects, and Artabanus, the captain of his guards, conspired against him and murdered him in his bed, in the 21st year of his reign, about 464 years before the Christian era. The personal accomplishments of Xerxes have been commended by ancient authors; and Herodotus observes, that there was not one man, among the millions of his army, that was equal to the monarch in comeliness or stature, or that was as worthy to preside over a great and extensive empire. The picture is finished, and the character of Xerxes completely known, when we hear Justin exclaim, that the vast armament which invaded Greece was without a head. Xerxes has been cited as an instance of humanity. When he reviewed his millions from a stately throne in the plains of Asia, he suddenly shed a torrent of tears on the recollection that the multitude of men he saw before his eyes, in one hundred years should be no more. His pride and insolence have been deservedly censured; he ordered chains to be thrown into the sea, and the waves to be whipped, because the first bridge he had laid across the Hellespont had been destroyed by a storm. He cut a channel through mount Athos, and saw his fleet sail in a place which before was dry ground. The very rivers were dried up by his army as he advanced towards Greece, and the cities which he entered reduced to want and poverty. Herodot. 1, c. 183, l. 7, c. 2, &c.—Diod. 11.—Strab. 9.—Ælian. 3, *V. Zacynthus, a native of Bœotia, who accompanied Hercules when he went into Spain to destroy Geryon. At the end of the expedition he was intrusted with the care of Geryon's flocks by the hero, and ordered to conduct them to Thebes. As he went on his journey, he was bit by a serpent, and some time after died. His companions carried his body away, and buried it in an island of the Ionian sea, which from that time was called Zacynthus. The island of Zacynthus, now called Zante, is situated at the south of Cephallenia, and at the west of the Peloponnesus. It is about 60 miles in circumference. Liv. 26, c. 24.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Strab. 2 and 8.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Homer. Od. 1, v. 246, l. 9, v. 24.—*Ovid. de Art. Zaleucus, a lawgiver of the Locrians, in Italy, and one of the disciples of Pythagoras, 550 B. C. He was very humane, and at the same time very austere, and he attempted to enforce the laws more by inspiring shame than dread. He had decreed that a person guilty of adultery should lose both his eyes. His philosophy was called to a trial when he was informed that his son was an adulterer. He ordered the law to be executed; the people interfered, but Zaleucus resisted, and rather than violate his own institutions, he commanded one of his own eyes, and one of those of his son, to be put out. This made such an impression upon the people, that while Zaleucus presided over the Locrians, no person was again found guilty of adultery. *Val. Zamolxis, or Zalmoxis, a slave and disciple of Pythagoras. He accompanied his master in Egypt, and afterwards retired into the country of the Getæ, which had given him birth. He began to civilize his countrymen; and the more easily to gain reputation, he concealed himself for three years in a subterraneous cave, and afterwards made them believe that he was just raised from the dead. Some place him before the age of Pythagoras. After death he received divine honours. Diod.—Herodot. 4, c. 19, &c.

Zarbiênus, a petty monarch of Asia, who was gained to the interest of the Romans by one of the officers of Lucullus. Tigranes put him to death for his desertion, and his funeral was celebrated with great magnificence by the Roman general. Plut. in Luc.

Zebina, Alexander, an imposter, who usurped the throne of Syria at the instigation of Ptolemy Physcon.

Zeno, I. a philosopher of Elia or Velia, in Italy, the disciple, or according to some, the adopted son of Parmenides, and the supposed inventor of dialectic. His opinions about the universe, the unity, incomprehensibility, and immutability of all things, were the same with those of Xenophanes and the rest of the Eleatic philosophers. It is said that he attempted to deliver his country from the tyranny of Nearchus. His plot was discovered, and he was exposed to the most excruciating torments to reveal the names of his accomplices; but this he bore with unparalleled fortitude, and, not to be at last conquered by tortures, he cut off his tongue with his teeth, and spit it into the face of the tyrant. Some say that he was pounded alive in a mortar, and that in the midst of his torments he called to Nearchus, as if to reveal something of importance; the tyrant approached him, and Zeno, as if willing to whisper to him, caught his ear with his teeth, and bit it off. Cic. Tusc. 2, c. 22, de Nat. D. 3, c. 33.—Diod. in Prog.—Val. Max. 3, c. 3.—Diog. 9.——II. The founder of the sect of the stoics, born at Citium, in the island of Cyprus. The first part of his life was spent in commercial pursuits, but he was soon called to more elevated employments. As he was returning from Phœnicia, a storm drove his ship on the coast of Attica, and he was shipwrecked near the Piræus. He entered the house of a bookseller, and, to dissipate his melancholy reflections he began to read. The book was written by Xenophon, and the merchant was so captivated by the eloquence and beauties of the philosopher, that from that time he renounced the pursuits of a busy life, and applied himself to the study of philosophy. Ten years were spent in frequenting the school of Crates, and the same number under Stilpo, Xenocrates, and Polemon. Perfect in every branch of knowledge, and improved from experience as well as observation, Zeno opened a school at Athens, and soon saw himself attended by the great, the learned, and the powerful. His followers were called Stoics, because they received the instruction of the philosopher in the portico called στοα. He was so respected during his lifetime, that the Athenians publicly decreed him a brazen statue, and a crown of gold, and engraved their decree, to give it more publicity, on two columns in the academy, and in the Lyceum. His life was an example of soberness and moderation, his manners were austere, and to his temperance and regularity he was indebted for the continual flow of health which he always enjoyed. After he had taught publicly for 48 years, he died in the 96th year of his age, B. C. 264. He was buried in that part of the city called Ceramicus, where the Athenians raised him a monument. The founder of the stoic philosophy shone before his followers as a pure example of imitation. He wished to live in the world as if nothing was properly his own; he loved others, and his affections were extended even to his enemies. He felt a pleasure in being kind, benevolent, and attentive; and he found that these sentiments of pleasure were reciprocal. He saw a connexion and dependance in the universe, and perceived that from thence arose the harmony of civil society, the tenderness of parents, and filial gratitude. In the attainment of virtue the goods of the mind were to be preferred to those of the body, and when that point was once gained, nothing could equal our happiness and perfection; and the stoic would view with indifference health or sickness, riches or poverty, pain and pleasure, which could neither move nor influence the serenity of his mind. Zeno recommended resignation; he knew that the laws of the universe cannot be changed by man, and therefore he wished that his disciples should not in prayer deprecate impending calamities, but rather beseech Providence to grant them fortitude to bear the severest trials with pleasure and due resignation to the will of Heaven. An arbitrary command over the passions was one of the rules of stoicism, to assist our friends in the hour of calamity was our duty, but to give way to childish sensations was unbecoming our nature. Pity, therefore, and anger were to be banished from the heart, propriety and decorum were to be the guides in every thing, and the external actions of men were the best indications of their inward feelings, their secret inclinations, and their character. It was the duty of the stoic to study himself; in the evening he was enjoined to review with critical accuracy the events of the day, and to regulate his future conduct with more care, and always to find an impartial witness within his own breast. Such were the leading characters of the stoic philosophy, whose followers were so illustrious, so perfect, and so numerous, and whose effects were productive of such exemplary virtues in the annals of the human mind. Zeno in his maxims used to say, that with virtue men could live happy under the most pressing calamities. He said that nature had given us two ears, and only one mouth, to tell us that we ought to listen more than speak. He compared those whose actions were dissonant with their professions to the coin of Alexandria, which appeared beautiful to the eye though made of the basest metals. He acknowledged only one God, the soul of the universe, which he conceived to be the body, and therefore believed that those two together united, the soul and the body, formed one perfect animal, which was the god of the stoics. Amongst the most illustrious followers of his doctrine, and as the most respectable writers, may be mentioned Epictetus, Seneca, the emperor Antoninus, &c. Cic. Acad. 1, c. 12, de Nat. D. 1, c. 14, l. 2, c. 8 and 24, l. 3, c. 24, pro. Mur. de Orat. 32, &c.—Finib.—Seneca.—Epictetus.—Arrian.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 26.—Diog.——III. An Epicurean philosopher of Sidon, who numbered among his pupils Cicero, Pomponius Atticus, Cotta, Pompey, &c. Cic. de Nat. D. 1, c. 21 and 34.——IV. A rhetorician, father to Polemon, who was made king of Pontus. The son of Polemon, who was king of Armenia, was also called Zeno. Strab. 12.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 56.——V. A native of Lepreos, son of Calliteles, crowned at the Olympic games and honoured with a statue in the grove of Jupiter and at Olympia. Paus. 6, c. 15.——The name of Zeno was common to some of the Roman emperors on the throne of Constantinople, in the 5th and 6th centuries.

Zenobia, I. a queen of Iberia, wife of Rhadamistus. She accompanied her husband when he was banished from his kingdom by the Armenians, but as she was unable to follow him on account of her pregnancy, she entreated him to murder her. Rhadamistus long hesitated, but fearful of her falling into the hands of his enemy, he obeyed, and threw her body into the Araxes. Her clothes kept her upon the surface of the water, where she was found by some shepherds, and as the wound was not mortal, her life was preserved, and she was carried to Tiridates, who acknowledged her as queen. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 51.——II. Septimia, a celebrated princess of Palmyra, who married Odenatus, whom Gallienus acknowledged as his partner on the Roman throne. After the death of her husband, which, according to some authors, she is said to have hastened, Zenobia reigned in the East as regent of her infant children, who were honoured with the title of Cæsars. She assumed the name of Augusta, and she appeared in imperial robes, and ordered herself to be styled the queen of the East. The troubles which at that time agitated the western parts of the empire prevented the emperor from checking the insolence and ambition of this princess, who boasted to be sprung from the Ptolemies of Egypt. Aurelian was no sooner invested with the imperial purple than he marched into the East, determined to punish the pride of Zenobia. He well knew her valour, and he was not ignorant that, in her wars against the Persians, she had distinguished herself no less than Odenatus. She was the mistress of the East, Egypt acknowledged her power, and all the provinces of Asia Minor were subject to her command. When Aurelian approached the plains of Syria, the Palmyrean queen appeared at the head of 700,000 men. She bore the labours of the field like the meanest of her soldiers, and walked on foot fearless of danger. Two battles were fought; the courage of the queen gained the superiority, but an imprudent evolution of the Palmyrean cavalry ruined her cause: and while they pursued with spirit the flying enemy, the Roman infantry suddenly fell upon the main body of Zenobia's army, and the defeat was inevitable. The queen fled to Palmyra, determined to support a siege. Aurelian followed her, and after he had almost exhausted his stores, he proposed terms of accommodation, which were rejected with disdain by the warlike princess. Her hopes of victory, however, soon vanished, and though she harassed the Romans night and day by continual sallies from her walls, and the working of her military engines, she despaired of success when she heard that the armies which were marching to her relief from Armenia, Persia, and the East, had partly been defeated and partly bribed from her allegiance. She fled from Palmyra in the night; but Aurelian, who was apprized of her escape, pursued her, and she was caught as she was crossing the river Euphrates. She was brought into the presence of Aurelian, and though the soldiers were clamorous for her death, she was reserved to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. She was treated with great humanity, and Aurelian gave her large possessions near Tibur, where she was permitted to live the rest of her days in peace, with all the grandeur and majesty which became a queen of the East and a warlike princess. Her children were patronised by the emperor, and married to persons of the first distinction at Rome. Zenobia has been admired not only for her military abilities, but also for her literary talents. She was acquainted with every branch of useful learning, and spoke with fluency the language of the Egyptians, the Greeks, and the Latins. She composed an abridgment of the history of the oriental nations, and of Egypt, which was greatly commended by the ancients. She received no less honour from the patronage she afforded to the celebrated Longinus, who was one of her favourites, and who taught her the Greek tongue. She has also been praised for her great chastity and her constancy, though she betrayed too often her propensities to cruelty and intoxication when in the midst of her officers. She fell into the hands of Aurelian about the 273d year of the Christian era. Aur. Vict.—Zos., &c.

Xenocles, was the shortest of the dwarfish sons of Carcinus. With Philocles and Theognis he is thus introduced, in an exemplification of Mnesilochus:—

ὁ δὲ Ξενοκλῆς ὢν κακὸς κακῶς ποιεῖ.—Thesmoph. 169.

He is mentioned with still more disrespect in the Ranæ, (v. 86.)

Ἡρακλῆς. ὁ δὲ Ξενοκλῆς;
Διόνυσος. ἐξόλοιτο νὴ Δία.

Yet this contemptible poet carried off from Euripides the tragic garland, Olymp. 91st, 2, B. C. 415. In the Pax, Aristophanes applies the term μηχανοδίφας to the family. From the Scholiast it appears that Xenocles was celebrated for introducing machinery and stage shows, especially in the ascent or descent of his gods. From the two lines in the Nubes, quoted above, we may infer that the father, Carcinus, was, like his son, fond of introducing the deities.

Zenodōrus, a sculptor in the age of Nero. He made a statue of Mercury, as also a colossus for the emperor, which was 110 or 120 feet high, and which was consecrated to the sun. The head of this colossus was some time after broken by Vespasian, who placed there the head of an Apollo surrounded with seven beams, each of which was seven feet and a half long. From this famous colossus, the modern coliseum, whose ruins are now so much admired at Rome, took its name. Plin. 34, c. 7.

Zenodōtus, I. a native of Trœzene, who wrote a history of Umbria. Dion. Hal. 2.—— II. A grammarian of Alexandria, in the age of Ptolemy Soter, by whom he was appointed to take care of the celebrated library of Alexandria. He died B. C. 245.

Zeuxidămus, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidæ. He was father of Archidamus, and grandson of Theopompus, and was succeeded by his son Archidamus. Paus. 3, c. 7.

Zeuxidas, a prætor of the Achæan league, deposed because he had proposed to his countrymen an alliance with the Romans.

Zeuxis, a celebrated painter, born at Heraclea, which some suppose to be the Heraclea of Sicily. He flourished about 468 years before the Christian era, and was the disciple of Apollodorus, and contemporary with Parrhasius. In the art of painting, he not only surpassed all his contemporaries, but also his master, and became so sensible, and at the same time so proud, of the value of his pieces, that he refused to sell them, observing that no sum of money, however great, was sufficient to buy them. His most celebrated paintings were his Jupiter, sitting on a throne surrounded by the gods; his Hercules, strangling the serpents in the presence of his affrighted parents; his modest Penelope; and his Helen, which was afterwards placed in the temple of Juno Lacinia, in Italy. This last piece he had painted at the request of the people of Crotona, and that he might not be without a model, they sent him the most beautiful of their virgins. Zeuxis examined their naked beauties, and retained five, from whose elegance and graces united, he conceived in his mind the form of the most perfect woman in the universe, which his pencil at last executed with wonderful success. His contest with Parrhasius is well known; (Vid. Parrhasius,) but though he represented nature in such perfection, and copied all her beauties with such exactness, he often found himself deceived. He painted grapes, and formed an idea of the goodness of his piece from the birds which came to eat the fruit on the canvass. But he soon acknowledged that the whole was an ill-executed piece, as the figure of the man who carried the grapes was not done with sufficient expression to terrify the birds. According to some, Zeuxis died from laughing at a comical picture he had made of an old woman. Cic. de Inv. 2, c. 1.—Plut. in Par. &c.—Quintil.

Zōĭlus, a sophist and grammarian of Amphipolis, B. C. 259. He rendered himself known by his severe criticisms on the works of Isocrates and Plato, and the poems of Homer, for which he received the name of Homeromastix, or the chastiser of Homer. He presented his criticisms to Ptolemy Philadelphus, but they were rejected with indignation, though the author declared that he starved for want of bread. Some say that Zoilus was cruelly stoned to death, or exposed on a cross, by order of Ptolemy; while others support that he was burnt alive at Smyrna. The name of Zoilus, is generally applied to austere critics. The works of this unfortunate grammarian are lost. Ælian. V. H. 11, c. 10.—Dionys. Hal.—Ovid. de Rem. Am. 266.

Zopȳrus, I. a Persian, son of Megabyzus, who, to show his attachment to Darius, the son of Hystaspes, while he besieged Babylon, cut off his ears and nose, and fled to the enemy, telling them that he had received such a treatment from his royal master because he had advised him to raise the siege, as the city was impregnable. This was credited by the Babylonians, and Zopyrus was appointed commander of all their forces. When he had totally gained their confidence, he betrayed the city into the hands of Darius, for which he was liberally rewarded. The regard of Darius for Zopyrus could never be more strongly expressed than what he used often to say, that he had rather have Zopyrus not mutilated than twenty Babylons. Herodot. 3, c. 154, &c.—Plut. in Apoph. reg. 3.—Justin. 1, c. 10.——II. A physician, in the age of Mithridates. He gave the monarch a description of an antidote which would prevail against all sorts of poisons. The experiment was tried upon criminals, and succeeded.

Zoroaster, a king of Bactria, supposed to have lived in the age of Ninus, king of Assyria, some time before the Trojan war. According to Justin, he first invented magic, or the doctrines of the Magi, and rendered himself known by his deep and acute researches in philosophy, the origin of the world, and the study of astronomy. He was respected by his subjects and contemporaries for his abilities as a monarch, a lawgiver, and a philosopher; and though many of his doctrines are puerile and ridiculous, yet his followers are still found in numbers in the wilds of Persia and the extensive provinces of India. Like Pythagoras, Zoroaster admitted no visible object of devotion, except fire, which he considered as the most proper emblem of a supreme being; which doctrines seem to have been preserved by Numa in the worship and ceremonies he instituted in honour of Vesta. According to some of the moderns, the doctrines, the laws, and regulations of this celebrated Bactrian are still extant, and they have been lately introduced in Europe, in a French translation, by M. Anquetil. The age of Zoroaster is so little known, that some speak of two, three, four, and even six lawgivers of that name. Some authors, who support that two persons only of this name flourished, described the first as an astronomer, living in Babylon, 2459 years B. C., whilst the era of the other, who is supposed to have been a native of Persia, and the restorer of the religion of the Magi, is fixed 589, and by some 519 years B. C. Justin. 1, c. 1.—August. de Civ. 21, c. 14. —Oros. 1.—Plin. 7, c. 10, l. 30, c. 1.

Zosimus, an officer in the reign of Theodosius the younger, about the year 410 of the Christian era. He wrote the history of the Roman emperors in Greek, from the age of Augustus to the beginning of the fifth century, of which only the five first books, and the beginning of the sixth, are extant. In the first of these he is very succinct in his account from the time of Augustus to the reign of Diocletian, but in the succeeding he becomes more diffuse and interesting. His composition is written with elegance, but not much fidelity; and the author showed his malevolence against the Christians in his history of Constantine and some of his successors. The best editions of Zosimus are that of Cellarius, 8vo. Jenæ, 1728, and that of Reitemier, 8vo. Lips. 1784.

PART III.

MYTHOLOGY.

ABĂRIS, a Scythian, son of Seuthes, in the age of Crœsus or the Trojan war, who received a flying arrow from Apollo, with which he gave oracles, and transported himself wherever he pleased. He is said to have returned to the Hyperborean countries from Athens without eating, and to have made the Trojan Palladium with the bones of Pelops. Some suppose that he wrote treatises in Greek; and it is reported, that there is a Greek manuscript of his epistles to Phalaris in the library of Augsburg. But there were probably two persons of that name. Herodot. 4, c. 36.—Strab. 7.—Paus. 3, c. 13.

ABAS, I. a son of Metanira, or Melaninia, changed into a lizard for laughing at Ceres. Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 7.——II. The 11th king of Argos, son of Belus, some say of Lynceus and Hypermnestra, was famous for his genius and valour. He was father to Prœtus and Acrisius, by Ocalea, and built Abæ. He reigned 23 years, B. C. 1384. Paus. 2, c. 16, l. 10, c. 35.—Hygin. 170, &c.—Apollod. 2, c. 2. Vid. Parts I. and II.

ABDĒRUS, a man of Opus in Locris, armour-bearer to Hercules, torn to pieces by the mares of Diomedes, which the hero had intrusted to his care when going to war against the Bistones. Hercules built a city, which, in honour of his friend, he called Abdera. Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Philostrat. 2, c. 25.

ABRŎTA, the wife of Nisus, the youngest of the sons of Ægeus. As a monument to her chastity, Nisus, after her death, ordered the garment which she wore to become the models of fashion in Megara. Plut. Quæst. Græc.

ABRŒUS, a giant, son of Tartarus and Terra. Hygin. Præf. fab.

ABSYRTUS, a son of Æetes, king of Colchis, and Hypsea. His sister Medea, as she fled away with Jason, tore his body to pieces, and strewed his limbs in her father's way to stop his pursuit. Some say that she murdered him in Colchis; others, near Istria. It is said by others that he was not murdered, but that he arrived safe in Illyricum. The place where he was killed has been called Tomos, and the river adjoining to it Absyrtos. Lucan. 3, v. 190.—Strab. 7.—Hygin. fab. 23.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Flacc. 8, v. 261.—Ovid. Trist. 3 el. 9.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 19.—Plin. 3, c. 21 and 26.

ACACALLIS, I. a nymph, mother of Philander and Phylacis by Apollo. These children were exposed to the wild beasts in Crete; but a goat gave them her milk, and preserved their life. Paus. 10, c. 16.——II. A daughter of MINOS, mother of Cydon, by Mercury, and of Amphithemis by Apollo. Paus. 8, c. 53.—Apollon. 4, v. 1493.

ACADĒMUS, an Athenian, who discovered to Castor and Pollux where Theseus had concealed their sister Helen, for which they amply rewarded him. Plut. in Thes.

ACALLE, a daughter of Minos and Pasiphae. Apollod. 3, c. 1.

ACAMAS, son of Theseus and Phædra, went with Diomedes to demand Helen from the Trojans after her elopement from Menelaus. In his embassy he had a son, called Munitus, by Laodice, the daughter of Priam. He was concerned in the Trojan war, and afterwards built the town of Acamentum, in Phrygia, and on his return to Greece called a tribe after his own name at Athens. Paus. 10, c. 26.—Q. Calab. 12.—Hygin. 108.

ACANTHA, a nymph loved by Apollo, and changed into the flower Acanthus.

ACASTUS, son of Pelias, king of Thessaly, by Anaxibia, married Astydamia or Hippolyte, who fell in love with Peleus, son of Æacus, when in banishment at her husband's court. Peleus, rejecting the addresses of Hippolyte, was accused before Acastus of attempts upon her virtue, and soon after, at a chase, exposed to wild beasts. Vulcan, by order of Jupiter, delivered Peleus, who returned to Thessaly, and put to death Acastus and his wife. Vid. Peleus and Astydamia.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 306.—Heroid. 13, v. 25.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, &c.

ACCA Laurentia, the wife of Faustulus, shepherd of king Numitor's flocks, who brought up Romulus and Remus, who had been exposed on the banks of the Tiber. Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 18.—Liv. 1, c. 4.—Aul. Gell. 6, c. 7. Vid. Part II.

ACESIUS, a surname of Apollo, in Elis and Attica, as god of medicine. Paus. 6, c. 24.

ACHĔLŌĪDES, a patronymic given to the Sirens as daughters of Achelous. Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 15.

ACHELŌUS, the son of Oceanus or Sol, by Terra or Tethys, god of the river of the same name in Epirus. As one of the numerous suiters of Dejanira, daughter of Œneus, he entered the lists against Hercules, and being inferior, changed himself into a serpent, and afterwards into an ox. Hercules broke off one of his horns, and Achelous being defeated, retired in disgrace into his bed of waters. The broken horn was taken up by the nymphs, and filled with fruits and flowers; and after it had for some time adorned the hand of the conqueror, it was presented to the goddess of Plenty. Some say that he was changed into a river after the victory of Hercules. This river is said by some to have sprung from the earth after the deluge. Herodot. 2, c. 10.—Strab. 10. Vid. Part I.

ACHILLES. Vid. Part II.

ACIDĀLIA, a surname of Venus, from a fountain of the same name in Bœotia, sacred to her. The Graces bathed in the fountain. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 720.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 468.

ACIS, a shepherd of Sicily, son of Faunus and the nymph Simæthis. Galatæa passionately loved him; upon which his rival, Polyphemus, through jealousy, crushed him to death with a piece of a broken rock. The gods changed Acis into a stream which rises from mount Ætna. Ovid. Met. 13. fab. 8.

ACMONIDES, one of the Cyclops. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 288.

ACŒTES, the pilot of the ship whose crew found Bacchus asleep, and carried him away. As they ridiculed the god, they were changed into sea monsters, but Acœtes was preserved. Ovid. Met. 3, fab. 8, &c.

ACONTEUS, a famous hunter, changed into a stone by the head of Medusa, at the nuptials of Perseus and Andromeda. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 201.

ACONTIUS, a youth of Cea, who, when he went to Delos to see the sacrifices of Diana, fell in love with Cydippe, a beautiful virgin, and being unable to obtain her, on account of the obscurity of his origin, wrote these verses on an apple, which he threw into her bosom:—

Juro tibi sancta per mystica sacra Dianæ
Me tibi venturam comitem, sponsamque futuram.

Cydippe read the verses, and being compelled by the oath she had inadvertently made, married Acontius. Ovid. Her. ep. 20.

ACRÆA, a surname of Diana, from a temple built to her by Melampus, on a mountain near Argos.——A surname of Juno. Paus. 2, c. 17.

ACRISIUS, son of Abas, king of Argos, by Ocalea, daughter of Mantineus. He was born at the same birth as Prœtus, with whom it is said that he quarrelled even in his mother's womb. After many dissensions Prœtus was driven from Argos. Acrisius had Danae by Eurydice, daughter of Lacedæmon; and being told by an oracle that his daughter's son would put him to death, he confined Danae in a brazen tower, to prevent her becoming a mother. She, however, became pregnant, by Jupiter, changed into a golden shower; and though Acrisius ordered her, and her infant called Perseus, to be exposed on the sea, yet they were saved; and Perseus soon after became so famous for his actions, that Acrisius, anxious to see so renowned a grandson, went to Larissa. Here Perseus, wishing to show his skill in throwing a quoit, killed an old man, who proved to be his grandfather, whom he knew not, and thus the oracle was unhappily fulfilled. Acrisius reigned about 31 years. Hygin. fab. 63.—Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 16.—Horat. 3, od. 16.—Apollod. 2, c. 2, &c.—Paus. 2, c. 16, &c.—Vid. Danae, Perseus, Polydectes.

ACTÆON, a famous huntsman, son of Aristæus and Autonoe daughter of Cadmus, whence he is called Autoneius heros. He saw Diana and her attendants bathing near Gargaphia, for which he was changed into a stag, and devoured by his own dogs. Paus. 9, c. 2.—Ovid. Met. 3, fab. 3.

ACTÆUS, a powerful person, who made himself master of a part of Greece, which he called Attica. His daughter Agraulos married Cecrops, whom the Athenians called their first king, though Actæus reigned before him. Paus. 1, c. 2 and 14.

ACTIS, son of Sol, went from Greece into Egypt, where he taught astrology, and founded Heliopolis. Diod. 5.

ACTOR, I. a companion of Hercules in his expedition against the Amazons.——II. The father of Menœtius by Ægina, whence Patroclus is called Actorides. Ovid. Trist. 1, el. 8. ——III. The father of Eurytus, and brother of Augeas. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

ACTORIDES, two brothers, so fond of each other, that, in driving a chariot, one generally held the reins and the other the whip; whence they are represented with two heads, four feet, and one body. Hercules conquered them. Pindar.

ADAD, a deity among the Assyrians, supposed to be the sun.

ADAMANTÆA, Jupiter's nurse in Crete, who suspended him in his cradle to a tree, that he might be found neither in the earth, the sea, nor in heaven. To drown the infant's cries, she had drums beat, and cymbals sounded, around the tree. Hygin. fab. 139.

ADDEPHAGIA, a goddess of the Sicilians. Ælian. 1, V. H. c. 27.

ADES. Vid. Hades.

ADMĒTA, daughter of Eurystheus, was priestess of Juno's temple at Argos.

ADMĒTUS, son of Pheres and Clymene, king of Pheræ, in Thessaly. Apollo, banished from heaven, is said to have tended his flocks for nine years, and to have obtained from the Parcæ, that Admetus should never die if another person laid down his life for him, which his wife Alceste did, devoting herself voluntarily to death. Admetus was one of the Argonauts, and was at the hunt of the Calydonian boar. Pelias promised his daughter in marriage only to him who could bring him a chariot drawn by a lion and a wild boar; and Admetus effected this by the aid of Apollo, and obtained Alceste's hand. Senec. in Medea.—Hygin. fab. 50, 51 & 243.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 3.—Apollod. 1, c. 8 & 9, &c. Vid. Part II.

ADŌNIS, son of Cinyras, by Myrrha, (vid. Myrrha,) was the favourite of Venus. He was fond of hunting, and at last received a mortal bite from a wild boar which he had wounded, and Venus changed him into a flower called anemony. Proserpine is said to have restored him to life, on condition that he should spend six months with her and the rest of the year with Venus. This implies the alternate return of summer and winter. Adonis is often taken for Osiris, because the festivals of both were often begun with mournful lamentations, and finished with a revival of joy, as they were returning to life again. Adonis had temples raised to his memory, and is said by some to have been beloved by Apollo and Bacchus. Apollod. 3, c.

14.—Propert. 2, el. 13, v. 53.—Virg. Ecl. 10, v. 18.—Bion. in Adon.—Hygin. 58, 164, 248, &c.—Ovid. Met. 10, fab. 10.—Musæus de Her.—Paus. 2, c. 20, l. 9, c. 41.

ADRASTIA, I. a daughter of Jupiter and Necessity. She is called by some Nemesis, and is the punisher of injustice. The Egyptians placed her above the moon, whence she looked down upon the actions of men. Strab. 13.——II. A daughter of Melisseus, to whom some attribute the nursing of Jupiter. She is the same as Adrasta. Apol. 1, c. 1.

ADRASTUS. Vid. Part II.

ÆA, a huntress, changed into an island of the same name by the gods, to rescue her from the pursuit of her lover, the river Phasis. It had a town called Æa, which was the capital of Colchis. Flacc. 5, v. 420.

ÆACUS, son of Jupiter by Ægina, daughter of Asopus, was king of the island of Œnopia, which he called by his mother's name. A pestilence having destroyed all his subjects, he entreated Jupiter to re-people his kingdom; and according to his desire, all the ants which were in an old oak were changed into men, and called by Æacus myrmidons, from μυρμηξ, an ant.—Æacus married Endeis, by whom he had Telamon and Peleus. He afterwards had Phocus by Psamathe, one of the Nereids. He was a man of such integrity that the ancients have made him one of the judges of hell, with Minos and Rhadamanthus. Horat. 2, od. 13, l. 4. od. 8.—Paus. 1, c. 44, l. 2, c. 29.—Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 25, l. 13, v. 25.—Propert. 4, el. 12.—Plut. de consol. ad Apoll.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Diod. 4.

ÆÆ, or ÆÆA.. Vid. Æa.

ÆCHMACŌRAS, a son of Hercules and Phyllone, daughter of Alcimedon, by whom he was exposed with his mother, to wild beasts, and miraculously saved by Hercules. Paus. 8, 12.

ÆDON, daughter of Pandarus, married Zethus, brother to Amphion, by whom she had a son called Itylus.—She was so jealous of her sister Niobe, because she had more children than herself, that she resolved to murder the elder, who was educated with Itylus. She by mistake killed her own son, and was changed into a goldfinch as she attempted to kill herself. Homer. Od. 19, v. 518.

ÆĒTA, or ÆETES, king of Colchis, son of Sol and Perseis, daughter of Oceanus, was father of Medea, Absyrtus, and Chalciope by Idya, one of the Oceanides. He killed Phryxus, son of Athamas, who had fled to his court on a golden ram. This murder he committed to obtain the fleece of the golden ram. The Argonauts came against Colchis, and recovered the golden fleece by means of Medea, though it was guarded by bulls that breathed fire, and by a venemous dragon. Their expedition has been celebrated by all the ancient poets. Vid. Jason, Medea, and Phryxus. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 1, &c.—Paus. 2 c. 3.—Justin. 43, c. 2.—Flacc. and Orpheus in Argon.

ÆGÆON, I. one of Lycaon's fifty sons. Apollod. 3, c. 8.——II. The son of Cœlus, or of Pontus and Terra, the same as Briareus. It is supposed that he was a notorious pirate, chiefly residing at Ægæ, whence his name; and that the fable about his one hundred hands arises from his having one hundred men to manage his oars in his piratical excursions. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 565.—Hesiod. Th. 149.—Homer. Il. 10, v. 404.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 10.

ÆGĔRIA. Vid. Egeria.

ÆGESTA, the daughter of Hippotes, and mother of Ægestus, called Acestes. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 554. Vid. Part I.

ÆGEUS, king of Athens, son of Pandion, being desirous of having children, went to consult the oracle, and in his return, stopped at the court of Pittheus, king of Trœzene, who gave him his daughter Æthra in marriage. He left her pregnant, and told her, that if she had a son, to send him to Athens as soon as he could lift a stone under which he had concealed his sword. By this sword he was to be known to Ægeus, who did not wish to make any public discovery of a son, for fear of his nephews, the Pallantides, who expected his crown. Æthra became mother of Theseus, whom she accordingly sent to Athens with his father's sword. At that time Ægeus lived with Medea, the divorced wife of Jason. When Theseus came to Athens, Medea attempted to poison him; but he escaped, and upon showing Ægeus the sword he wore, discovered himself to be his son. When Theseus returned from Crete, after the death of the Minotaur, he forgot, agreeable to the engagement made with his father, to hoist up white sails as a signal of his success; and Ægeus, at the sight of black sails, concluding that his son was dead, threw himself from a high rock into the sea; which from him, as some suppose, has been called the Ægean. Ægeus reigned forty-eight years, and died B. C. 1235. He is supposed to have first introduced into Greece the worship of Venus Urania, to render the goddess propitious to his wishes in having a son. Vid. Theseus, Minotaurus, and Medea. Apollod. 1, c. 8, 9, l. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 5, 22, 38, l. 4, c. 2.—Plut. in Thes.—Hygin. fab. 37, 43, 79, and 173.

ÆGIALE, one of Phaeton's sisters, changed into poplars, and their tears into amber. They are called Heliades.

ÆGIALEUS, I. son of Adrastus by Amphitea or Demoanassa, was one of the Epigoni. They all returned home safe, except Ægialeus, who was killed. Paus. 1, c. 43, 44, l. 2, c. 20, l. 9, c. 5.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 7.——II. The same as Absyrtus, brother to Medea. Justin. 42, c. 3.——Cic. de Nat. D. 3.—Diod. 4.

ÆGĪNA, daughter of Asopus, had Æacus by Jupiter, changed into a flame of fire. Some say that she was changed by Jupiter into the island which bears her name. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 12.—Paus. 2, c. 5 and 29. Vid. Part I.

ÆGĬOCHUS, a surname of Jupiter, from his being brought up by the goat Amalthæa, and using her skin, instead of a shield, in the war of the Titans. Diod. 5.

ÆGĪPAN, a name of Pan, because he had goat's feet.

ÆGIS, the shield of Jupiter, απο της αιγος, a goat's skin. Jupiter gave this shield to Pallas, who placed upon it Medusa's head, which turned into stones all those who fixed their eyes upon it. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 352 and 435.

ÆGISTHUS. Vid. Part II.

ÆGLE, the youngest daughter of Æsculapius and Lampetia.

ÆGOBOLUS, a surname of Bacchus at Potnia, in Bœotia.

ÆGOCĔROS, or Capricornus, an animal into which Pan transformed himself when flying before Typhon, in the war with the giants. Jupiter made him a constellation. Lucret. 1, v. 613.

ÆGYPĀNES, a fabulous country in the middle of Africa, said to be inhabited by monsters. Mela, 1, c. 4 and 8.

ÆGYPTUS, son of Belus, and brother to Danaus, gave his 50 sons in marriage to the 50 daughters of his brother. He was killed by his niece Polyxena. Vid. Danaus, Danaides, Lynceus. Ægyptus was king, after his father, of a part of Africa, which from him has been called Ægyptus. Hygin. fab. 168, 170.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Ovid. Heroid. 14.—Paus. 7, c. 21. Vid. Part I.

ÆLLO, one of the Harpies (from ἀελλα tempestas.) Flac. 4, v. 450.—Hesiod. Th. 267.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 710.

ÆLURUS, (a cat,) a deity worshipped by the Egyptians; and, after death, embalmed, and buried in the city of Bubastis. Herodot. 2, c. 66, &c.—Diod. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. 1.—A. Gell. 20, c. 7.—Plut. in Pr.

ÆNĒAS. Vid. Part II.

ÆŎLUS, the king of storms and winds, was the son of Hippotas. He reigned over Æolia; and because he was the inventor of sails, and a great astronomer, the poets have called him the god of the wind. The name seems to be derived from αιολος, various, because the winds over which he presided are ever varying—There were two others, a king of Etruria, father to Macareus and Canace, and a son of Hellenus, often confounded with the god of the winds. The last married Enaretta, by whom he had seven sons and five daughters. Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Homer. Od. 10, v. 1.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 478, l. 14, v. 224.—Apollon. 4, Argon.—Flacc. 1, v. 556.—Diod. 4 and 5.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 56, &c.

ÆPĪTUS. Vid. Part II.

ÆSCULĀPIUS, son of Apollo, by Coronis, or, as some say, by Larissa, daughter of Phlegias, was god of medicine. The god, in a fit of anger, destroyed Coronis with lightning, but saved the infant from her womb, and gave him to be educated to Chiron, who taught him the art of medicine. Some authors say that Coronis exposed her child near Epidaurus. A goat of the flocks of Aresthanas gave him her milk, and the dog who kept the flock stood by him to shelter him from injury. He was found by the master of the flock, who went in search of his stray goat, and saw his head surrounded with resplendent rays of light. Æsculapius was physician to the Argonauts, and considered so skilled in the medicinal power of plants, that he was called the inventor, as well as the god of medicine. He restored many to life, of which Pluto complained to Jupiter, who struck Æsculapius with thunder. He received divine honours after death, chiefly at Epidaurus, Pergamus, Athens, Smyrna, &c. Goats, bulls, lambs, and pigs were sacrificed on his altars; and the cock and the serpent were sacred to him. Æsculapius was represented with a large beard, holding in his hand a staff, round which was wreathed a serpent; his other hand was supported on the head of a serpent. He married Epione, by whom he had two sons, famous for their skill in medicine, Machaon and Podalirus; and four daughters, of whom Hygiea, goddess of health, is the most celebrated. Some have supposed that he lived a short time after the Trojan war. Hesiod makes no mention of him. Homer. Il. 4, v. 193. Hymn. in Æscul.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Apollon. 4. Argon.—Hygin. fab. 49.—Ovid. Met. 2, fab. 8.—Paus. 2, c. 11 and 27, l. 7, c. 23, &c.—Diod. 4.—Pindar, Pyth. 3.—Lucan. Dial. de Saltat.—Val. Max. 1, c. 8.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 22, says there were three of this name: the 1st, a son of Apollo, worshipped in Arcadia; 2d, a brother of Mercury; 3d, a man who first taught medicine.

ÆSON, son of Cretheus, was born at the same birth as Pelias. He succeeded his father in the kingdom of Iolchos, but was soon exiled by his brother. He married Alcimeda, by whom he had Jason, whose education he intrusted to Chiron, being afraid of Pelias. When Jason was grown up, he demanded his father's kingdom from his uncle, who gave him evasive answers, and persuaded him to go in quest of the golden fleece. At his return, Jason found his father very infirm; and Medea, at his request, drew the blood from Æson's veins, and refilled them with the juice of certain herbs which she had gathered, and immediately the old man recovered the vigor and bloom of youth. Some say that Æson killed himself by drinking bull's blood, to avoid the persecution of Pelias. Diod. 4.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 285.—Hygin. fab. 12.

ÆTHALĪDES, a herald, son of Mercury, to whom it was granted to be amongst the dead and the living at stated times. Apollon. Argon. 1, v. 641.

ÆTHLIUS, a son of Jupiter by Protogenia, was father of Endymion. Apollod. 1, c. 7.

ÆTHON, a horse of the sun. Ovid. Met. 2, fab. 1.——of Pallas. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 89.

ÆTHRA, daughter of Pitheus, king of Trœzene, and mother of Theseus. She was carried away by Castor and Pollux, when they recovered their sister Helen, whom Theseus had stolen and intrusted to her care. She went with Helen to Troy. Homer. Il. 3, v. 144.—Paus. 2, c. 31, l. 5, c. 19.—Hygin. fab. 37 and 79. Plut. in Thes.—Ovid. Her. 10. v. 131.

ÆTHŪSA, a daughter of Neptune by Amphitrite, or Alcyone, mother by Apollo of Eleuthere and two sons. Paus. 9, c. 20.

ÆTOLUS. Vid. Part II.

AGAMEMNON. Vid. Part II.

AGANIPPE. Vid. Part I.

AGĀVE, daughter of Cadmus and Hermione, married Echion, by whom she had Pentheus. She is said to have killed her husband in celebrating the orgies of Bacchus. She received divine honours after death, because she had contributed to the education of Bacchus. Theocrit. 26.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 725.—Lucan. 1, v. 574.—Stat. Theb. 11, v. 318.—Apollod. 3, c. 4.

AGELĀUS, a son of Hercules and Omphale, from which Crœsus was descended.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.

AGĒNOR, king of Phœnicia, son of Neptune and Libya, and brother to Belus. He married Telephassa, by whom he had Cadmus, Phœnix, Cilix, and Europa. Hygin. fab. 6. Ital. 1, v. 15, l. 17, v. 58.—Apollod. 2, c. 1, l. 3, c. 1.

AGLĀIA. Vid. Charites.

AGLAUROS, or AGRAULOS, daughter of Erechtheus, the oldest king of Athens, was changed into a stone by Mercury. Some make her a daughter of Cecrops. Vid. Herse. Ovid. Met. 2, fab. 12.

AGNO, one of the nymphs who nursed Jupiter. She gave her name to a fountain on mount Lycæus. When the priest of Jupiter, after a prayer, stirred the waters of this fountain with a bough, a thick vapour arose, which was soon dissolved into a plentiful shower. Paus. 8, c. 31, &c.

AGONIUS, a Roman deity, who presided over the actions of men. Vid. Agonalia, Part II.

AGORÆA, a name of Minerva at Sparta. Paus. 3, c. 11.

AGORÆUS, a surname of Mercury among the Athenians, from his presiding over the markets. Paus. 1, c. 15.

AGRE, one of Actæon's dogs. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 213.

AGRIUS, son of Parthaon, drove his brother Œneus from the throne. He was afterwards expelled by Diomedes, the grandson of Œneus, upon which he killed himself. Hygin. fab. 175 and 242.—Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Homer. Il. 14, v. 117.

AGYLEUS, and AGYIEUS, from αγυια, a street, a surname of Apollo, because sacrifices were offered to him in the public streets of Athens. Horat. 4, od. 6.

AJAX. Vid. Part II.

AIUS LOCUTIUS, a deity to whom the Romans erected an altar from the following circumstance: one of the common people, called Cedicius, informed the tribunes, that as he passed one night through one of the streets of the city, a voice more than human, issuing from above Vesta's temple, told him that Rome would soon be attacked by the Gauls. His information was neglected, but his veracity was proved by the event; and Camillus, after the conquest of the Gauls, buil a temple to that supernatural voice which had given Rome warning of the approaching calamity, under the name of Aius Locutius.

ALÆA, a surname of Minerva in Peloponnesus. Her festivals are also called Alæa. Paus. 8, c. 4, 7.

ALALA, the goddess of war, sister to Mars. Plut. de glor. Athen.

ALIASTOR, one of Pluto's horses when he carried away Proserpine. Claud. de Rapt. Pros. 1, v. 286.

ALBION, son of Neptune by Amphitrite, came into Britain, where he established a kingdom, and first introduced astrology and the art of building ships. He was killed at the mouth of the Rhone with stones thrown by Jupiter, because he opposed the passage of Hercules. Mela, 2, c. 5. Vid. Part I.

ALCÆUS, I. a son of Androgeus, who went with Hercules into Thrace, and was made king of part of the country. Apollod. 2, c. 5.——II. A son of Perseus, father of Amphitryon and Anaxo. Apol. 2, c. 4.—Paus. 8, c. 14. Vid. Part II.

ALCATHOUS, I. a son of Pelops, who being suspected of murdering his brother Chrysippus, came to Megara, where he killed a lion, which had destroyed the king's son. He succeeded to the kingdom of Megara, and, in commemoration of his services, festivals, called Alcathoia, were instituted at Megara. Paus. 1, c. 4, &c. ——II. A Trojan, who married Hippodamia, daughter of Anchises. He was killed in the Trojan war by Idomeneus. Homer. Il. 12, v. 93.

ALCESTE, or ALCESTIS, daughter of Pelias and Anaxibia, married Admetus. She, with her sisters, put to death her father, that he might be restored to youth and vigour by Medea, who, however, refused to perform her promise. Upon this, the sisters fled to Admetus, who married Alceste. They were soon pursued by an army, headed by their brother Acastus; and Admetus being taken prisoner was redeemed from death by the generous offer of his wife, who was sacrificed in his stead to appease the shades of her father. Some say that Alceste lay down her life for her husband, when she had been told by an oracle that he could never recover from a disease except some one of his friends died in his stead. According to some authors, Hercules brought her back from hell. Vid. Admetus. Juv. 6, v. 651.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Paus. 5, c. 17. —Hygin. fab. 251.—Eurip. in Alcest.

ALCIDES, a name of Hercules, from his strength, αλκη, or from his grandfather Alceus.

ALCIDICE, the mother of Tyro, by Salmoneus. Apollod. 2, c. 9.

ALCIMEDE, the mother of Jason, by Æson. Flacc. 1, v. 296.

ALCINOE, a daughter of Sthenelus son of Perseus. Apollod. 2, c. 4.

ALCINOUS. Vid. Part II.

ALCIPPE, I. a daughter of the god Mars and Agraulos. Apollod. 3, c. 14.——II. The wife of Metion, and mother to Eupalamus. Id. 3, c. 16.——III. The daughter of Œneamus, and wife of Evenus, by whom she had Marpessa. Virg. Ecl. 7.

ALCITHOE, a Theban woman, who ridiculed the orgies of Bacchus. She was changed into a bat, and the spindle and yarn with which she worked, into a vine and ivy. Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 1.

ALCMÆON, I. was son of the prophet Amphiaraus and Eriphyle. His father going to the Theban war, where, according to an oracle, he was to perish, charged him to revenge his death upon Eriphyle, who had betrayed him. Vid. Eriphyle. As soon as he heard of his father's death, he murdered his mother, for which crime the furies persecuted him till Phlegeus purified him, and gave him his daughter Alphesibœa in marriage. Acmæon gave her the fatal collar which his mother had received to betray his father, and afterwards divorced her, and married Callirhoe, the daughter of Achelous, to whom he promised the necklace he had given to Alphesibœa. When he attempted to recover it, Alphesibœa's brothers murdered him on account of the treatment he had shown their sister, and left his body a prey to dogs and wild beasts. Alcmæon's children by Callirhoe revenged their father's death by killing his murderers. *Vid. Alphesibœa, Amphiaraus. A son of Ægyptus, the husband of Hippomedusa. Apollod.

ALCMENA, was daughter of Electryon, king of Argos, by Anaxo, whom Plut. de Reb. Græc. calls Lysidice, and Diod. l. 2, Eurymede. Her father promised his crown and his daughter to Amphitryon, if he would revenge the death of his sons, who had been all killed, except Licymnius, by the Teleboans, a people of Ætolia. While Amphitryon was gone against the Ætolians, Jupiter introduced himself to Alcmena as her husband. When the time of her delivery was at hand, Juno, influenced by jealousy, employed Lucina to prolong her travails, until Nicippe, the wife of Sthenelus, should bring forth; that her son Eurystheus, enjoying the privilege which Jupiter had in this case conferred on priority of birth, might control the destiny of his rival. At length, Alcmena brought forth twins, Hercules, son of Jupiter, and Iphiclus, son of Amphitryon. After Amphitryon's death, Alcmena married Rhadamanthus, and retired to Ocalea in Bœotia. This marriage, according to some authors, was celebrated in the island of Leuce. The people of Megara said that she died in her way from Argos to Thebes, and that she was buried in the temple of Jupiter Olympius. Paus. 1, c. 41, l. 5, c. 18, l. 9, c. 16. —Plut. in Thes. & Romul.—Homer. Od. 11, Il. 19.—Pindar. Pyth. 9.—Lucian. Dial. Deor.—Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 29.—Apollod. 2, c. 4, 7, l. 3, c. 1.—Plaut. in Amphit.—Herodot. 2, c. 43 and 45.——Vid. Amphitryon, Hercules, Eurystheus.

Alcon, I. a famous archer, who one day saw his son attacked by a serpent, and aimed at him so dexterously that he killed the reptile without hurting his son.——II. A son of Mars.——III. A son of Amycus. These two last were at the chase of the Calydonian boar. Hygin. fab. 173.

Alcyŏne, or Halcyŏne, I. daughter of Æolus, married Ceyx, who was drowned as he was going to Claros to consult the oracle. On the death of her husband Ceyx, who was drowned, she threw herself into the sea, and was changed into the bird which bears her name, and which the ancient poets feigned brooded over its young upon the waters and kept them calm. Virg. G. 1, v. 399.—Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 10.—Hygin. fab. 65.——II. One of the Pleiades, daughter of Atlas. She had Arethusa by Neptune, and Eleuthera by Apollo. She, with her sisters, was changed into a constellation. Vid. Pleiades. Paus. 2, c. 30, l. 3, c. 18.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Hygin. fab. 157.——III. The daughter of Evenus, carried away by Apollo after her marriage. Her husband pursued the ravisher with bows and arrows, but was not able to recover her. Upon this her parents called her Alcyone, and compared her fate to that of the wife of Ceyx. Homer. Il. 9, v. 558.

Alcyŏneus, a giant, killed by Hercules. His daughters, mourning his death, threw themselves into the sea, and were changed into alcyons by Amphitrite. Claudian. de Rap. Pros. —Apollod. 1, c. 6.

Alea, a surname of Minerva, from her temple, built by Aleus, son of Aphidas, at Tegæa, in Arcadia. The statue of the goddess, made of ivory, was carried by Augustus to Rome. Paus. 8, c. 4 and 46.

Alecto. Vid. Eumenides.

Alector, succeeded his father Anaxagoras in the kingdom of Argos, and was father to Iphis and Capaneus. Paus. 2, c. 18.—Apollod. 3, c. 6.

Alectryon, a youth by whose neglect the favours which Venus accorded to Mars were discovered by the gods. Mars was so incensed that he changed Alectryon into a cock, which, still mindful of his neglect, early announces the approach of the sun. Lucian. in Alect.

Aletes, a son of Ægisthus, murdered by Orestes. Hygin. fab. 122.

Alexănor, a son of Machaon, who built in Sicyon a temple to his grandfather Æsculapius, and received divine honours after death. Paus. 2, c. 11.

Alexicacus, a surname given to Apollo by the Athenians, because he delivered them from the plague during the Peloponnesian war.

Alirrothius, a son of Neptune. Hearing that his father had been defeated by Minerva, in his dispute about giving a name to Athens, he went to the citadel, and endeavoured to cut down the olive which had sprung from the ground, and given the victory to Minerva; but in the attempt he missed his aim, and cut his own legs so severely that he instantly expired.

Aloëus, a giant, son of Titan and Terra. He married Iphimedia, by whom Neptune had the twins Othus and Ephialtus. Aloeus educated them as his own, and from that circumstance they have been called Aloides. They made war against the gods, and were killed by Apollo and Diana. They grew up nine inches every month, and were only nine years old when they undertook their war. They built the town of Ascra, at the foot of mount Helicon. Paus. 9, c. 29.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 582.—Homer. Il. 5, Od. 11.

Aloïdes and Aloïdæ. Vid. Aloeus.

Alpheia, a surname of Diana in Elis.——A surname of the nymph Arethusa, because loved by the Alpheus. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 487.

Alphesiboea, daughter of the river Phlegeus, married Alcmæon, son of Amphiaraus. Vid. Alcmæon.

Alphĕus. Vid. Part I.

Althæa, daughter of Thestius and Eurythemis, married Œneus, king of Calydon, by whom she had many children, among whom was Meleager. She killed herself in her grief for his death, which in a moment of passion she had occasioned.

Althæmĕnes, a son of Creteus, king of Crete. Hearing that either he or his brothers were to be their father's murderers, he fled to Rhodes, where he made a settlement to avoid becoming a parricide. After the death of all his other sons, Creteus went after his son Althæmenes; when he landed in Rhodes, the inhabitants attacked him, supposing him to be an enemy, and he was killed by the hand of his own son. When Althæmenes knew that he had killed his father, he entreated the gods to remove him, and the earth immediately opened and swallowed him up. Apollod. 3, c. 2.

Alycæus, son of Sciron, was killed by Theseus. A place in Megara received its name from him. Plut. in Thes.

Amalthæa, I. daughter of Melissus, king of Crete, fed Jupiter with goat's milk. Hence some authors have called her a goat, and have maintained that Jupiter, to reward her kindnesses, placed her in heaven as a constellation, and gave one of her horns to the nymphs who had taken care of his infant years. This horn was called the horn of plenty, and had the power to give the nymphs whatever they desired.

Diod. 3, 4 and 5.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 113.—Strab. 10.—Hygin. fab. 139.—Paus. 7, c. 26.——II. A Sibyl of Cumæ, called also Hierophile and Demophile. She is supposed to be the same who brought nine books of prophecies to Tarquin, king of Rome, &c. Varro.—Tibul. 2, el. 5, v. 67. Vid. Sibyllæ.

Amānus, or Omānus, a Persian deity, in honour of whom a yearly festival (the Saca) was celebrated at Zela, in Cappadocia; or, according to others, in Pontus. The rites of his worship were performed daily, with the singing of hymns, &c., by the Magi before his altar, which was erected on a hill called Pyræthea, and which, protected by an enclosure, bore the eternal fire. He was considered as the emblem of Mythras or the Sun. Strab. 11.—Millin.

Amaracus, an officer of Cinyras, changed into marjoram.

Amastrus, one of the auxiliaries of Perses, against Æetes, king of Colchis, killed by Argus, son of Phryxus. Flacc. 6, v. 544.

Amita. Vid. Part II.

Amazŏnes, or Amazŏnides, a community of women, according to an old tradition, who permitted no men to reside among them, fought under the conduct of a queen, and long constituted a formidable state. They had intercourse with the men of the neighbouring nations merely for the sake of perpetuating their community. The male children they sent back to their fathers, but they brought up the females to war, and burned off the right breast, that this part of the body might not impede them in the use of the bow. From this circumstance they were called Amazons, (a non, et μαζα, mamma,) i. e., wanting a breast. The ancients enumerate three nations of Amazons:—1. The African, who made great conquests under their queen Myrena, but were afterwards extirpated by Hercules.—2. The Asiatic, the most famous of all, who dwelt in Pontus, on the river Thermodon. Themiscyra was their capital. These once made war on all Asia, and built Ephesus. Their queen, Hippolyta, was vanquished by Hercules. They attacked Attica in the time of Theseus. They came to the assistance of Troy under their queen Penthesilea, who was killed, as some writers declare, by Achilles. About 330 B. C. their queen, Thalestris, made a visit to Alexander of Macedon, soon after which they disappear from history.—3. The Scythian, a branch of the Asiatic. They attacked the neighbouring Scythians, but afterwards contracted marriages with them, and went further into Sarmatia, where they hunted and made war in company with their husbands. As regards the existence of the Amazons, Vid. Justin, and, above all, Cesarotti, who has expressly treated of this subject in a dissertation which accompanies his first translation of the Iliad; respecting their use in fable, Vid Ariosto nil furioso, Canto XIX.—Encyclopedia Amer.—Millin.—Justin. 2, c. 4.—Curt. 6, c. 5.—Plin. 6, c. 7, l. 14, c. 8.—Herodot. 4, c. 110.—Strab. 11.—Paus. 7, c. 2.—Plut. in Thes.

Amazŏnius, a surname of Apollo at Lacedæmon.

Ambulli, a surname of Castor and Pollux in Sparta.

Ameles, a river of hell, whose waters no vessel could contain. Plut. 10, de Rep.

Ammŏne, or Amymŏne, a daughter of Danaus, changed into a fountain which is near Argos, and flows into the lake Lerna. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 240.

Amithaon, or Amythaon, was father to Melampus, the famous prophet. Stat. Theb. 3, v. 451.

Ammon. Vid. Hammon.

Ammŏnia, a name of Juno in Elis, as being the wife of Jupiter Ammon. Paus. 5, c. 15.

Amphiarāus, son of Oicleus, or, according to others, of Apollo, by Hypermnestra, was at the chase of the Calydonian boar, and accompanied the Argonauts in their expedition. He was famous for his knowledge of futurity, and thence he is called by some son of Apollo. He married Eriphyle, the sister of Adrastus, king of Argos, by whom he had two sons, Alcmæon and Amphilochus. When Adrastus, at the request of Polynices, declared war against Thebes, Amphiaraus secreted himself, not to accompany his brother-in-law in an expedition in which he knew he was to perish. But Eriphyle, who knew where he had concealed himself, was prevailed upon to betray him by Polynices, who gave her, as a reward for her perfidy, a golden necklace set with diamonds. Amphiaraus being thus discovered, went to the war, but previously charged his son Alcmæon, to put to death his mother Eriphyle, as soon as he was informed that he was killed. The Theban war was fatal to the Argives, and Amphiaraus was swallowed up in his chariot by the earth, as he attempted to retire from the battle. The news of his death was brought to Alcmæon, who immediately executed his father's command, and murdered Eriphyle. Amphiaraus received divine honours after death, and had a celebrated temple and oracle at Oropos in Attica. His statue was made of white marble, and near his temple was a fountain, whose waters were ever held sacred. They only who had consulted his oracle, or had been delivered from a disease, were permitted to bathe in it, after which they threw pieces of gold and silver into the stream. Those who consulted the oracle of Amphiaraus first purified themselves, and abstained from meat for 24 hours, and three days from wine, after which they sacrificed a ram to the prophet, and spread the skin upon the ground, upon which they slept in expectation of receiving in a dream the answer of the oracle. Plutarch de orat. defect. mentions, that the oracle of Amphiaraus was once consulted in the time of Xerxes, by one of the servants of Mardonius, for his master, who was then with an army in Greece; and that the servant, when asleep, saw in a dream the priest of the temple, who upbraided him, and drove him away, and even threw stones at his head when he refused to comply. This oracle was verified in the death of Mardonius, who was actually killed by the blow of a stone he received on the head. Cic. de Div. 1, c, 40.—Philostr. in vit. Apollon. 2, c. 11.—*Homer. Amphictyon, son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, reigned at Athens after Cranaus, and first attempted to give the interpretation of dreams and to draw omens. Some say that the deluge happened in his age. Justin. 2, c. 6. Vid. Part II.

AMPHIDĂMUS, I. one of the Argonauts. Flac. 1, v. 376.——II. A son of Busiris, killed by Hercules. Apollod. 2, c. 5.

AMPHILŌCHUS, a son of Amphiaraus and Eriphyle. After the Trojan war he left Argos, his native country, and built Amphilochus, a town of Epirus. Strab. 7.—Paus. 2, c. 18.

AMPHINŌMUS, and ANAPIUS. Vid. Part II.

AMPHĪON, I. was son of Jupiter, by Antiope, daughter of Nycteus. Amphion was born at the same birth as Zethus, on mount Citheron, where Antiope had fled to avoid the resentment of Dirce; and the two children were exposed in the woods, but preserved by a shepherd. Vid. Antiope. When Amphion grew up, he cultivated poetry, and made such an uncommon progress in music, that he is said to have been the inventor of it, and to have built the walls of Thebes at the sound of his lyre. Mercury taught him music, and gave him the lyre. He was the first who raised an altar to this god. Zethus and Amphion united to avenge the wrongs which their mother had suffered from the cruelties of Dirce. *Homer. He married Niobe, daughter of Tantalus, by whom he had many children, among whom was Chloris, the wife of Neleus. He has been confounded by mythologists with the son of Antiope, though Homer in his Odyssey speaks of them both, and distinguishes them beyond contradiction. Upon the death of his wife and children, Amphion destroyed himself. Homer. Od. 11, v. 261 and 282.—Ælian. V. H. 12, v. 36.—Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 5.——III. One of the Argonauts. Hygin. fab. 14.

AMPHIPȳROS, a surname of Diana, because she carries a torch in both her hands. Sophocles. in Trach.

AMPHISBÆNA, a two-headed serpent in the deserts of Libya, whose bite was venomous and deadly. Lucan. 9, v. 719.

AMPHISSA, or ISSA, a daughter of Macareus, beloved by Apollo. She gave her name to a city of the Locri Ozolæ, in which was a temple of Minerva. Liv. 37, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 703.—Lucan. 3, v. 172.

AMPHITRĪTE, I. daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, married Neptune, though she had made a vow of perpetual celibacy. She had by him Triton, one of the sea deities. She had a statue at Corinth in the temple of Neptune. She is sometimes called Salatia, and is often taken for the sea itself. Varro. de. L. L. 4.—Hesiod. Theog. 930.—Apollod. 3.—Claudian. de Rapt. Pros. 1, v. 104.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 14.——II. One of the Nereides.

AMPHĪTRYON, a Theban prince, son of Alcæus and Hipponome. His sister Anaxo had married Electryon, king of Mycenæ, whose sons were killed in battle by the Teleboans. Electryon had promised his crown, and daughter Alcmena, to him who could revenge the death of his sons upon the Teleboans; and Amphitryon offered himself, and was received, on condition that he should not approach Alcmena before he had obtained a victory. Jupiter, who was captivated with the charms of Alcmena, borrowed the features of Amphitryon, when he was gone to the war, and introduced himself to Electryon's daughter, as her husband returned victorious. Alemena became pregnant of Hercules, by Jupiter, and of Iphiclus by Amphitryon after his return. Vid. Alcmena. When Amphitryon returned from the war, he brought back to Electryon, the herds which the Teleboans had taken from him. One of the cows having strayed from the rest, Amphitryon, to bring them together, threw a stick, which struck the horns of the cow, and rebounded with such violence upon Electryon, that he died on the spot. After this accidental murder, Sthenelus, Electryon's brother, seized the kingdom of Mycenæ, and obliged Amphitryon to leave Argolis, and retire to Thebes with Alcmena. Creon, king of Thebes, purified him of the murder. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 213.—Propert. 4, el. 10, v. 1.—Hesiod. in Sout. Hercul.—Hygin. fab. 29.—Paus. 8, c. 14.

AMULIUS. Vid. Part II.

AMȳCUS, I. a son of Neptune by Melia, of Bithynis according to others, king of the Bebryces. He was famous for his skill in the management of the cestus, and he challenged all strangers to a trial of strength. When the Argonauts, in their expedition, stopped on his coasts, he treated them with great kindness, and Pollux accepted his challenge, and killed him when he attempted to overcome him by fraud. Apollon. 2. Argon.—Theocrit. Id. 22.—Apollon. 1, c. 9.——II. A son of Ixion, and the cloud. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 245.

AMȳMŌNE, daughter of Danaus and Europa, married Enceladus, son of Egyptus, whom she murdered the first night of her nuptials. It was said that she was the only one of the fifty sisters who was not condemned to fill a leaky tub with water in hell. Neptune carried her away, and in the place where she stood, he raised a fountain, by striking a rock. The fountain has been called Amymone. Propert. 2, el. 26, v. 56.—Apollod. 2.—Strab. 8.—Ovid. Amor. 1, v. 415.—Hygin. fab. 169.

AMYNTOR, a king of Argos, son of Phrastor. He deprived his son Phœnix of his eyes, to punish him for the violence he had offered to Clytia, his concubine. Hygin. fab. 173.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 307.—Apollod. 3.—Homer. Il. 9.

AMYTHĀON, son of Cretheus, king of Iolchos, by Tyro. He married Idomene, by whom he had Bias and Melampus. After his father's death, he established himself in Messenia, with his brother Neleus, and re-established or regulated the Olympic games. Apollod. 1.—Homer. Od. 11.

ANAĪTIS, a goddess of Armenia. The festivals of the deity were called Sacarum Festa, and when they were celebrated, both sexes assisted at the ceremony, and inebriated themselves to such a degree that the whole was concluded by a scene of the greatest lasciviousness and intemperance. They were first instituted by Cyrus, when he marched against the Saces, that he might detain the enemy by the novelty and sweetness of food to which they were unaccustomed, and thus easily destroy them

Strab. 11.——Diana is also worshipped under this name by the Lydians. Plin. 33, c. 4.

ANĪPHE. Vid. Part I.

ANAUSIS, one of Medea's suiters, killed by Styrus. Val. Flacc. 6, v. 43.

ANAX, a son of Cœlus and Terra, father to Asterius, from whom Miletus has been called Anactoria. Paus. 1, c. 36, l. 7, c. 2.

ANAXARĒTE, a girl of Salamis, whose lover, Iphis, hung himself at her door. She saw this sad spectacle without emotion or pity, and was changed into a stone. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 748.

ANAXIBIA, I. a sister of Agamemnon, mother of seven sons and two daughters by Nestor. Paus. 2, c. 29.——II. A daughter of Bia, brother to the physician Melampus. She married Pelias, king of Iolchos, by whom she had Acastus, and four daughters, Pisidice, Pelopea, Hippothoe, and Alceste. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—She is called daughter of Dymas by Hygin. fab. 14.

ANCÆUS, I. the son of Lycurgus and Antinoe, was in the expedition of the Argonauts. He was at the chase of the Calydonian boar, in which he perished. Hygin. fab. 173 and 248.—Ovid. Met. 8.——II. The son of Neptune and Astypalæa. He went with the Argonauts, and succeeded Typhis as pilot of the ship Argo. He reigned in Ionia, where he married Samia, daughter of the Mæander, by whom he had four sons, Perilas, Enudas, Samus, Alithersus, and one daughter called Parthenope. Orpheus. Argon. He was once told by one of his servants, whom he pressed with hard labour in his vineyard, that he never would taste of the produce of his vines. He had already the cup in his hand, and called the prophet to convince him of his falsehood; when the servant, yet firm in his prediction, uttered this well-known proverb:

Πολλα μεταξυ πελει κυλικος και χειλεος ακρου.
Multa cadunt inter calicem supremaque labra.

And that very moment Anceus was told that a wild boar had entered his vineyard; upon which he threw down the cup, and ran to drive away the wild beast. He was killed in the attempt.

ANCHEMŎLUS. Vid. Part II.

ANCHIĀLUS, a god of the Jews, as some suppose, in Martial's epigrams, 11 ep. 95.

ANCHĪSES. Vid. Part II.

ANCHŪRUS, a son of Midas, king of Phrygia. When the earth had opened and swallowed up many buildings, the oracle declared that it would never close if Midas did not throw into it whatever he had most precious. Anchurus, thinking himself the most precious of his father's possessions, leaped into the earth, which closed immediately over his head. Midas erected there an altar of stones to Jupiter, and that altar was the first object which he turned into gold when he had received his fatal gift from the gods. This unpolished lump of gold existed still in the age of Plutarch. Plut. in Parall.

ANCĪLE, and ANCŪLE, a sacred shield, which, according to the Roman authors, fell from heaven in the reign of Numa, when the Roman people laboured under a pestilence. Upon the preservation of this shield depended the fate of the Roman empire, and therefore Numa ordered eleven of the same size and form to be made, that if ever any attempt was made to carry them away, the plunderer might find it difficult to distinguish the true one. They were made with such exactness, that the king promised Veterius Mamurius, the artist, whatever reward he desired. Vid. Mamurius. They were kept in the temple of Vesta, and an order of priests was chosen to watch over their safety. These priests were called Salii, and were twelve in number; they carried every year, on the first of March, the shields in a solemn procession round the walls of Rome, dancing and singing praises to the god Mars. This sacred festival continued three days, during which it was deemed unfortunate to undertake any expedition; and Tacitus in 1 Hist. has attributed the unsuccessful campaign of the emperor Otho against Vitellius to his leaving Rome during the celebration of the Ancyliorum festum. These two verses of Ovid explain the origin of the word Ancyle, which is applied to these shields:—

Idque ancyle vocat, quod ab omni parte recisum est,
Quemque notes oculis, angulus omnis abest.

ANDRÆMON, I. the father of Thoas. Hygin. fab. 97.——II. The son-in-law and successor of Œneus. Apollod. 1.

ANDROCLĒA, a daughter of Antipœnus of Thebes. She, with her sister Alcida, sacrificed herself in the service of her country, when the oracle had promised the victory to her countrymen, who were engaged in a war against Orchomenos, if any one of noble birth devoted himself for the glory of his nation. Hercules, who fought on the side of Thebes, dedicated to them the image of a lion in the temple of Diana. Paus. 9, c. 17.

ANDRŎGEUS, son of Minos and Pasiphæ, was famous for his skill in wrestling. He overcame every antagonist at Athens, and became such a favourite of the people, that Ægeus, king of the country, grew jealous of his popularity, and caused him to be assassinated as he was going to Thebes. Some say that he was killed by the wild bull of Marathon. The Athenians established festivals, by order of Minos, in honour of his son, and called them Androgeia. Hygin. fab. 41.—Diod. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 20.—Paus. 1, c. 1 and 27.—Apollod. 2, c. 5, l. 3, c. 1 and 15.—Plut. in Thes.

ANDROGĪNÆ, a fabulous nation of Africa, beyond the Nasamones. Lucret. 5, v. 837.—Plin. 7, c. 2.

ANDROMĀCHE. Vid. Part II.

ANDRŌMĔDA, a daughter of Cepheus, king of Æthiopia, by Cassiope. Neptune drowned the kingdom, and sent a sea-monster to ravage the country, because Cassiope had boasted herself fairer than Juno and the Nereides, and nothing could stop his resentment if Andromeda was not exposed to the sea-monster. She was accordingly tied naked on a rock, and at the moment that the monster was going to devour her, Perseus, who returned through the air from the conquest of the Gorgons, saw her, and was captivated with her beauty. He changed the sea-monster into a rock, by showing him Medusa's head, and untied Andromeda and married her. He had by her many children, among whom were Sthenelus, Ancæus, and Electryon. The marriage of Andromeda with Perseus was opposed by Phineus, who, after a bloody battle, was changed into a stone by Perseus. Some say that Minerva made Andromeda a constellation in heaven after her death. Vid. Medusa, Perseus. Hygin. fab. 64.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 43.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Manil. 5, v. 533.—Propert. 3, el. 21.—According to Pliny, 1, 5, c. 31, it was at Joppa, in Judæa, that Andromeda was tied on a rock. He mentions that the skeleton of the huge sea monster, to which she had been exposed, was brought to Rome by Scaurus, and carefully preserved.

Anguitia, a wood in the country of the Marci, between the lake Fucinus and Alba. Serpents, it is said, could not injure the inhabitants, because they were descended from Circe, whose power over these venemous creatures has been much celebrated. Sil. 8.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 759.

Anigrus. Vid. Part I.

Anna, a goddess, in whose honour the Romans instituted festivals. She was, according to some, the daughter of Belus and sister of Dido, who, after her sister's death, fled from Carthage, which Jarbas had besieged, and came to Italy, where Æneas met her and gave her an honourable reception. But Lavinia, the wife of Æneas, was jealous of the tender treatment which was shown to Anna, and meditated her ruin. Anna was apprized of this by her sister in a dream, and fled to the river Numicus, of which she became a deity, and ordered the inhabitants of the country to call her Anna Perenna, because she would remain for ever under the waters. Her festivals were performed with many rejoicings, and the females often, in the midst of their cheerfulness, forgot their natural decency. They were introduced into Rome, and celebrated the 15th of March. The Romans generally sacrificed to her, to obtain a long and happy life: and hence the words Annare and Perennare. Some have supposed Anna to be the moon, quia mensibus impleat annum; others call her Themis, or Io, the daughter of Inachus, and sometimes Maia. Another more received opinion maintains that Anna was a woman of Bovillæ, who, when the Roman populace had fled from the city to mount Sacer, brought them cakes every day: for which the Romans, when peace was re-established, decreed immortal honours to her whom they called Perenna, ab perennitate cultûs, and who, as they supposed, was become one of their deities. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 653, &c.—Sil. 8, v. 79.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 9, 20, 421 and 500.

Antæa, the wife of Proteus, called also Stenobœa. Homer. Il.

Antæus, a giant of Libya, son of Terra and Neptune. He was so strong in wrestling, that he boasted that he would erect a temple to his father with the sculls of his conquered antagonists. Hercules attacked him, and as he received new strength from his mother as often as he touched the ground, the hero lifted him up in the air, and squeezed him to death in his arms. Lucan. 4, v, 598.—Stat. 6. Theb. v. 893.—Juv. 3, v. 88.

Antēnor. Vid. Part II.

Antĕros, (avri epos, against love,) a son of Mars and Venus. He was not, as the derivation of his name implies, a deity that presided over an opposition to love, but he was the god of mutual love and of mutual tenderness. Venus had complained to Themis, that her son Cupid always continued a child, and was told, that if he had another brother, he would grow up in a short space of time. As soon as Anteros was born, Cupid felt his strength increase and his wings enlarge; but if ever his brother was at a distance from him, he found himself reduced to his ancient shape. From this circumstance it is seen that return of passion gives vigour to love. The altar, however, which was erected to this deity at Elis, was dedicated to him, not as the god of mutual love, but as the avenger of love unrequited. The Athenians also ascribed to him similar attributes, as did probably all the other Grecian states on the first introduction of his worship. Cic. de Nat.—Paus. Att. 30, and Ælian. 23. Anteros had a temple at Athens raised to his honour, when Meles had experienced the coldness and disdain of Timagoras, whom he passionately esteemed, and for whom he had killed himself. Vid. Meles. Cupid and Anteros are often represented striving to seize a palm-tree from one another. They were always painted in the Greek academies, to inform the scholars that it is their immediate duty to be grateful to their teachers, and to reward their trouble with love and reverence. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.—Paus. 1, c. 30, l. 6, c. 23. Vid. Part II.

Antheas, a son of Eumelus, killed in attempting to sow corn from the chariot of Triptolemus, drawn by dragons. Paus. 7, c. 18.

Anthius, (flowery,) a name of Bacchus worshipped at Athens. He had also a statue at Patræ.

Anthŏres, a companion of Hercules, who followed Evander and settled in Italy. He was killed in the war of Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 778.

Anthropophăgi, a people of Scythia, that fed on human flesh. They lived near the country of the Messagetæ. Plin. 4, c. 12, l. 6, c. 30.—Mela, 2, c. 1.

Anticlēa, a daughter of Diocles, who married Machaon, the son of Æsculapius, by whom she had Nicomachus and Gorgasus. Paus. 4, c. 30. Vid. Part II.

Antigŏne, a daughter of Laomedon. She was the sister of Priam, and was changed into a stork for comparing herself to Juno. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 93. Vid. Part II.

Antilŏchus, I. a king of Messenia.——II. The eldest son of Nestor by Eurydice. He went to the Trojan war with his father, and was killed by Memnon, the son of Aurora. Homer. Od. 4.—Ovid. Heroid. says he was killed by Hector. Vid. Part II.

Antimăchus. Vid. Part II

Antinoe, a daughter of Pelius. Apollod. 1.—Paus. 8, c. 11.

Antinous, a native of Ithaca, son of Eupeithes, and one of Penelope's suiters. He was brutal and cruel in his manners, and excited his companions to destroy Telemachus, whose advice comforted his mother Penelope. When Ulysses returned home he came to the palace in a beggar's dress, and begged for bread, which Antinous refused, and even struck him. After Ulysses had discovered himself to Telemachus and Eumæus, he attacked the suiters, who were ignorant who he was, and killed Antinous among the first. Homer. Od. 1, 16, 17, and 22. Vid. Part II.

Antiŏpe, I. daughter of Nycteus, king of Thebes, by Polyxo, was beloved by Jupiter, who, to deceive her, changed himself into a satyr. She fled to mount Cithæron, where she brought forth twins, Amphion and Zethus. After this she fled to Epopeus, king of Sicyon, who married her. Some say that Epopeus carried her away. Lycus killed Epopeus, and recovered Antiope, whom he loved, and married, though his niece. His first wife, Dirce, was jealous of his new connexion; and Antiope was delivered into her hands, and confined in a prison, where she was daily tormented. After many years' imprisonment she escaped, and went after her sons, who undertook to avenge her wrongs upon Lycus and his wife. They took Thebes, put the king to death, and tied Dirce to the tail of a wild bull, who dragged her till she died. Bacchus changed her into a fountain, and deprived Antiope of the use of her senses. In this forlorn situation she wandered all over Greece, and at last found relief from Phocus, son of Ornytion, who cured her of her disorder, and married her. Hyginus, fab. 7, says that Antiope was divorced by Lycus, and that after her repudiation she became pregnant by Jupiter. Meanwhile Lycus married Dirce, who suspected Antiope and imprisoned her. Antiope, however, escaped from her confinement, and brought forth on mount Cithæron. Some authors have called her daughter of Asopus, because she was born on the banks of that river. The Scholiast on Apollon. 1, v. 735, maintains that there were two persons of the name, one the daughter of Nycteus, and the other of Asopus, and mother of Amphion and Zethus. Paus. 2, c. 6, l. 9, c. 17.—Ovid. 6. Met. v. 110.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Propert. 3, el. 15.—Hom. Od, 11, v. 259.—Hygin. fab. 7, 8, and 155.——II. A daughter of Mars, queen of the Amazons, taken prisoner by Hercules, and given in marriage to Theseus. She is also called Hippolyte. Vid. Hippolyte.——III. A daughter of Æolus, mother of Bœotus and Hellen, by Neptune. Hygin. fab. 157.

Antiphātes, I. a king of the Læstrygones, descended from Lamus, who founded Formiæ. Ulysses, returning from Troy, came upon his coasts, and sent three men to examine the country. Antiphates devoured one of them and pursued the others, and sunk the fleet of Ulysses with stones, except the ship in which Ulysses was. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 232.——II. A son of Sarpedon. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 696.——III. The grandfather of Amphiaraus. Homer. Od.

Anūbis, an Egyptian deity, represented under the form of a man with the head of a dog. His worship was introduced from Egypt into Greece and Italy. He is supposed by some to be Mercury, because he is sometimes represented with a caduceus. Some make him brother of Osiris, some his son by Nephthys, the wife of Typhon. Diod. 1.—Lucan. 8, v. 331.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 686.—Plut. de Isid. and Osirid.—Herodot. 4.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 698. The worship of Anubis, however, was not confined to Egypt; and even in the latter periods of the Roman empire, not much more than a century before the official recognition of Christianity, and at least 180 years after the preaching of St. Paul at Rome, the emperor performed in public the offices of highpriest of Anubis.

Aon, a son of Neptune, who came to Eubœa and Bœotia, from Apulia, when he collected the inhabitants into cities and reigned over them. They were called Aones, and the country Aonia, from him.

Aōris, I. a famous hunter, son of Aras, king of Corinth. He was so fond of his sister Arathyræa, that he called part of the country by her name. Paus. 2, c. 12.——II. The wife of Neleus, called more commonly Chloris. Id. 9, c. 36.

Apharētus, fell in love with Marpessa, daughter of Œnomaus, and carried her away.

Apharēus, a king of Messenia, son of Perieres and Gorgophone, who married Arene daughter of Œbalus, by whom he had three sons. Paus. 3, c. 1. Vid. Part II.

Aphrodīte, the Grecian name of Venus, from αφρος, froth, because Venus is said to have been born from the froth of the ocean. Hesiod. Th. 195.—Plin. 36, c. 5.

Apis, I. one of the ancient kings of Peloponnesus, son of Phoroneus and Laodice. Some say that Apollo was his father, and that he was king of Argos, while others call him king of Sicyon, and fix the time of his reign above 200 years earlier. He was a native of Naupactus, and descended from Inachus. He received divine honours after death, as he had been munificent and humane to his subjects; and the country where he reigned was called Apia. Some, among whom is Varro and St. Augustine, have imagined that Apis went to Egypt with a colony of Greeks, and that he civilized the inhabitants and polished their manners, for which they made him a god after death, and paid divine honours to him under the name of Serapis. Æschyl. in Suppl.—August. de Civ. Dei, 18, c. 5.—Paus. 2, c. 5.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.——II. A son of Jason, born in Arcadia; he was killed by the horses of Ætolus. Paus. 5, c. 1. Vid. Part I.——III. A god of the Egyptians, worshipped under the form of an ox. Some say that Isis and Osiris are the deities worshipped under this name, because during their reign they taught the Egyptians agriculture. The Egyptians believed that the soul of Osiris was really departed into the ox, because that animal had been of the most essential service in the cultivation of the ground, which Osiris had introduced into Egypt. The ox that was chosen was always distinguished by particular marks; his body was black; he had a square white spot upon the forehead, the figure of an eagle upon the back, a knot under the tongue like a beetle, the hairs of his tail were double, and his right side was marked with a whitish spot, resembling the crescent of the moon. The festival of Apis lasted seven days. The ox was conducted to the banks of the Nile with much ceremony, and if he had lived to the time when their sacred books allowed, they drowned him in the river, and embalmed his body, and buried it in solemn state in the city of Memphis. After his death, which sometimes was natural, the greatest cries and lamentations were heard in Egypt, as if Osiris was just dead; the priests shaved their heads, which was a sign ot the deepest mourning. This continued till another ox appeared with the proper characteristics to succeed as the deity, which was followed with the greatest acclamations, as if Osiris was returned to life. This ox, which was found to represent Apis, was left 40 days in the city of the Nile before he was carried to Memphis, during which time none but women were permitted to appear before him, and this they performed, according to their superstitious notions, in a wanton and indecent manner. There was also an ox worshipped at Heliopolis, under the name of Mnevis; some supposed that he was Osiris, but others maintain that the Apis of Memphis was sacred to Osiris, and Mnevis to Isis. When Cambyses came into Egypt, the people were celebrating the festivals of Apis with every mark of joy and triumph, which the conqueror interpreted as an insult upon himself. He called the priests of Apis, and ordered the deity himself to come before him. When he saw that an ox was the object of their veneration, and the cause of such rejoicings, he wounded it on the thigh, ordered the priests to be chastised, and commanded his soldiers to slaughter such as were found celebrating such riotous festivals. The god Apis had generally two stables, or rather temples. If he eat from the hand, it was a favourable omen; but if he refused the food that was offered him, it was interpreted as unlucky. From this, Germanicus, when he visited Egypt, drew the omens of his approaching death. When his oracle was consulted, incense was burnt on an altar, and a piece of money placed upon it, after which the people that wished to know futurity applied their ear to the mouth of the god and immediately retired, stopping their ears till they had departed from the temple. The first sounds that were heard were taken as the answer of the oracle to their questions. Paus. 7, c. 22.—Herodot. 2 and 3.—Plin. 8, c. 38, &c.—Strab. 7.—Plut. in Isid. and Osir.—Apollod. 1, c. 7. l. 2, c. 1.—Mela, 1, c. 9.—Plin. 8, c. 39, &c.—Strab. 7.—Ælian. V. H. 4 and 6.—Diod. 1. Apis is universally allowed to have been a symbol of the Nile and its fertilizing influence upon the soil; and because it was believed that the inundations of that river were greatly affected by the operation of the moon, it was required that her emblem, the crescent, should designate the ox who was to be invested with the title and honours of Apis. For the same reason, according to Ælian, the rejoicings that attended the celebration of his rites commenced with the commencing increase of the river. This always occurred when the sun was in a particular sign; whence the inhabitants attributed, also, in part to his influence the fertility that succeeded. Apis was, therefore, likewise a symbol of the sun, and of consequence, no less sacred to Osiris than to Isis his wife. When the worship of Serapis superseded that of Osiris, the ox Apis became, in like manner, consecrated to him.

APISAON. Vid. Part II.

APOLLO son of Jupiter, and Latona, called also Phœbus, is often confounded with the sun. According to Cicero, 3, de Nat. Deor. there were four persons of this name. The first was son of Vulcan, and the tutelary god of the Athenians. The second was son of Corybas, and was born in Crete, for the dominion of which he disputed even with Jupiter himself. The third was son of Jupiter and Latona, and came from the nations of the Hyperboreans to Delphi. The fourth was born in Arcadia, and called Nomion, because he gave laws to the inhabitants. To the son of Jupiter and Latona all the actions of the others seem to have been attributed. The Apollo, son of Vulcan, was the same as the Orus of the Egyptians, and was the most ancient, from whom the actions of the others have been copied. The three others seem to be of Grecian origin. The tradition that the son of Latona was born in the floating island of Delos, is taken from the Egyptian mythology, which asserts that the son of Vulcan, which is supposed to be Orus, was saved by his mother Isis from the persecution of Typhon, and intrusted to the care of Latona, who concealed him in the island of Chemmis. When Latona was pregnant by Jupiter, Juno, who was ever jealous of her husband's amours, raised the serpent Python to torment Latona, who was refused a place to give birth to her children, till Neptune, moved at the severity of her fate, raised the island of Delos from the bottom of the sea, where Latona brought forth Apollo and Diana. Apollo was the god of the fine arts, of medicine, music, poetry, and eloquence; of all which he was deemed the inventor. He was the only one of the gods whose oracles were in general repute over the world. When his son Æsculapius had been killed with the thunders of Jupiter, for raising the dead to life, Apollo, in his resentment, killed the Cyclops who had fabricated the thunderbolts. Jupiter was incensed at this act of violence, and he banished Apollo from heaven. The exiled deity came to Admetus, king of Thessaly, and hired himself to be one of his shepherds, in which ignoble employment he remained nine years; from which circumstance he was called the god of shepherds, and at his sacrifices a wolf was generally offered, as the enemy of the sheepfold. During his residence at Thessaly, he rewarded the tender treatment of Admetus. He gave him a chariot, drawn by a lion and a bull, with which he was able to obtain in marriage Alceste the daughter of Pelias; and, soon after, the Parcæ granted, at Apollo's request, that Admetus might be redeemed from death if another person laid down his life for him. He assisted Neptune in building the walls of Troy; and when he was refused the promised reward from Laomedon, the king of the country, he destroyed the inhabitants by a pestilence. As soon as he was born, Apollo destroyed with arrows the serpent Python, whom Juno had sent to persecute Latona; hence he was called Pythius. He was not the inventor of the lyre, as some have imagined, but Mercury gave it him, and received as a reward the famous caduceus with which Apollo was wont to drive the flocks of Admetus. He received the surnames of Phœbus, Delius, Cynthius, Pæan, Delphicus, Nomius, Lycius, Clarius, Ismenius, Vulturius, Smintheus, &c., for reasons which are explained under those words. Apollo is generally represented with long hair, and the Romans were fond of imitating his figure; and therefore in their youth they were remarkable for their fine head of hair, which they cut short at the age of seventeen or eighteen; he is always represented as a tall beardless young man, with a handsome shape, holding in his hand a bow, and sometimes a lyre; his head is generally surrounded with beams of light. He was the deity who, according to the notions of the ancients, inflicted plagues, and in that moment he appeared surrounded with clouds. His worship and power were universally acknowledged: he had temples and statues in every country, particularly in Egypt, Greece, and Italy. His statue, which stood upon mount Actium, as a mark to mariners to avoid the dangerous coasts, was particularly famous, and it appeared a great distance at sea. Augustus, before the battle of Actium, addressed himself to it for victory. The griffin, the cock, the grasshopper, the wolf, the crow, the swan, the hawk, the olive, the laurel, the palm-tree, &c., were sacred to him; and in his sacrifices, wolves, hawks, bullocks, and lambs were immolated to him. As he presided over poetry he was often seen on mount Parnassus with the nine muses. His most famous oracles were at Delphi, Delos, Claros, Tenedos, Cyrrha, and Patara. His most splendid temple was at Delphi, where every nation and individual made considerable presents when they consulted the oracle. Augustus, after the battle of Actium, built him a temple on mount Palatine, which he enriched with a valuable library. He had a famous Colossus in Rhodes, which was one of the seven wonders of the world. Apolla has been taken for the sun; but it may be proved by different passages in the ancient writers, that Apollo, the Sun, Phœbus, and Hyperion, were all different characters and deities, though confounded together. *Ovid. Apomyios. Vid. Jupiter.

Apostrophia, a surname of Venus in Bœotia, who was distinguished under these names, Venus, Urania, Vulgaria, and Apostrophia. The former was the patroness of a pure and chaste love; the second of carnal and sensual desires: and the last incited men to illicit and unnatural gratifications, to incests and rapes. Venus Apostrophia was invoked by the Thebans, that they might be saved from such unlawful desires. She is the same as the Verticordia of the Romans. Paus. 9, c. 16.—Val. Max. 8, c. 15.

Appiades, a name given to these five deities, Venus, Pallas, Vesta, Concord, and Peace, because a temple was erected to them near the Appian roads. The name was also applied to those courtesans at Rome who lived near the temple of Venus by the Appiæ, Aquæ, and the forum of J. Cæsar. Ovid. de Art. Am. 3, v. 452.

Aquarius, one of the signs of the zodiac, rising in January, and setting in February. Some suppose that Ganymede was changed into this sign. Virg. G. 3, v. 304.

Arabs, and Arabus, a son of Apollo and Babylone, who first invented medicine, and taught it in Arabia, which is called after his name. Plin. 7, c. 56.

Arachne, a woman of Colophon, daughter to Idmon, a dier. She challenged Minerva to a trial of skill with the needle, and represented on her work the amours of Jupiter with Europa, Antiope, Leda, Asteria, Danae, Alcmene, &c.; but though her piece was perfect and masterly, she was defeated by Minerva, and hanged herself in despair, and was changed into a spider by the goddess. *Ovid. Archia, one of the Oceanides, wife to Inachus. Hygin. fab. 143.

Architis, a name of Venus, worshipped on mount Libanus.

Ardalus, a son of Vulcan, said to have been the first who invented the pipe. He gave it to the muses, who on that account have been called Ardalides and Ardaliolides. Paus. 2, c. 31.

Arduine, the goddess of hunting among the Gauls; represented with the same attributes as the Diana of the Romans.

Areta, a daughter of Rhexenor, descended from Neptune, who married her uncle Alcinous, by whom she had Nausicaa. Homer. Od. 7 and 8.—Apollod. 1.

Arethusa, a nymph of Elis, daughter of Oceanus, and one of Diana's attendants. As she returned one day from hunting, she sat near the Alpheus, and bathed in the stream. The god of the river was enamoured of her, and he pursued her over the mountains and all the country, when Arethusa implored Diana, who changed her into a fountain. The Alpheus immediately mingled his streams with hers, and Diana opened a secret passage under the earth and under the sea, where the waters of Arethusa disappeared, and rose in the island of Ortygia, near Syracuse, in Sicily. The river Alpheus followed her also under the sea, and rose also in Ortygia; so that, as mythologists relate, whatever is thrown into the Alpheus, in Elis, rises again, after some time, in the fountain Arethusa, near Syracuse. Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 10.—Athen. 7.—Paus. Vid. Part I.

Argope, a nymph of mount Parnassus, mother of Thamyris, by Philammon, the son of Apollo. Pans. 4, c. 33.

Argiphontes, a surname given to Mercury, because he killed the hundred-eyed Argus by order of Jupiter.

Argiva, a surname of Juno, worshipped at Argos. She had also a temple at Sparta, consecrated to her by Eurydice, the daughter of Lacedæmon. Paus. 4, c. 13.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 547.

Argo, the name of the ship which carried Jason and his 54 companions to Colchis, when they resolved to recover the golden fleece. The derivation of the word Argo has been often disputed. Some derive it from Argos, the person who first proposed the expedition, and who built the ship. Others maintain that it was built at Argos, whence its name. Cicero, Tusc. 1, c. c. 20, calls it Argo, because it carried Grecians, commonly called Argives. Diod. 4, derives the word from αργος, which signifies swift. Ptolemy says, but falsely, that Hercules built the ship, and called it Argo, after a son of Jason, who bore the same name. The ship Argo had 50 oars. According to many authors, she had a beam on her prow, cut in the forest of Dodona by Minerva, which had the power of giving oracles to the Argonauts. This ship was the first that ever sailed on the sea, as some report. After the expedition was finished, Jason ordered her to be drawn aground at the Isthmus of Corinth, and consecrated her to the god of the sea. The poets have made her a constellation in heaven. Hygin. fab. 14, A. P. 2, c. 37.—Catull. de Nupt. Pel. & Thet.—Val. Flacc. 1, v. 93, &c.—Phædr. 4, fab. 6.—Seneca in Medea.—*Apollon. Argonautæ, a name given to those ancient heroes who went with Jason on board the ship Argo to Colchis, about 89 years before the taking of Troy, or 1263 B. C. The causes of this expedition arose from the following circumstance:—Athamas king of Thebes, had married Ino, the daughter of Cadmus, whom he divorced to marry Nephele, by whom he had two children, Phryxus and Helle. As Nephele was subject to certain fits of madness, Athamas repudiated her, and took a second time Ino, by whom he had soon after two sons, Learchus and Melicerta. As the children of Nephele were to succeed to their father by right of birth, Ino conceived an immortal hatred against them, and she caused the city of Thebes to be visited by a pestilence, by poisoning all the grain which had been sown in the earth. Upon this the oracle was consulted; and as it had been corrupted by means of Ino, the answer was that Nephele's children should be immolated to the gods. Phryxus was apprized of this, and he immediately embarked with his sister Helle, and fled to the court of Æetes, king of Colchis, one of his near relations. In the voyage Helle died, and Phryxus arrived safe at Colchis, and was received with kindness by the king. The poets have embellished the flight of Phryxus, by supposing that he and Helle fled through the air on a ram which had a golden fleece and wings, and was endowed with the faculties of speech. As they were going to be sacrificed, the ram took them on his back, and instantly disappeared in the air. On their way Helle was giddy, and fell into that part of the sea which from her was called the Hellespont. When Phryxus came to Colchis, he sacrificed the ram to Jupiter, or, according to others, to Mars, to whom he also dedicated the golden fleece. He soon after married Chalciope, the daughter of Æetes; but his father-in-law envied him the possession of the golden fleece, and therefore to obtain it he murdered him. Some time after this event, when Jason, the son of Æson, demanded of his uncle Pelias the crown which he usurped, (Vid. Pelias, Jason, Æson,) Pelias said that he would restore it to him, provided he avenged the death of their common relation Phryxus, whom Æetes had basely murdered in Colchis. Jason, who was in the vigour of youth, and of an ambitious soul, cheerfully undertook the expedition, and embarked with all the young princes of Greece in the ship Argo. They stopped at the island of Lemnos, where they remained two years, and raised a new race of men from the Lemnian women who had murdered their husbands. Vid. Hypsipyle. After they had left Lemnos, they visited Samothrace, where they offered sacrifices to the gods, and thence passed to Troas and to Cyzicum. Here they met with a favourable reception from Cyzicus, the king of the country. The night after their departure, they were driven back by a storm again on the coast of Cyzicum, and the inhabitants, supposing them to be their enemies, the Pelasgi, furiously attacked them. In this nocturnal engagement the slaughter was great, and Cyzicus was killed by the hand of Jason, who, to expiate the murder he had ignorantly committed, buried him in a magnificent manner, and offered sacrifices to the mother of the gods, to whom he built a temple on mount Dyndymus. From Cyzicum they visited Bebrycia, otherwise called Bithynia, where Pollux accepted the challenge of Amycus, king of the country, in the combat of the cestus, and slew him. They were driven from Bebrycia by a storm, to Salmydessa, on the coast of Thrace, where they delivered Phineus, king of the place, from the persecution of the harpies. Phineus directed their course through the Cyanean rock or the Symplegades, (Vid. Cyaneæ,) and they safely entered the Euxine sea. They visited the country of the Mariandinians, where Lycus reigned, and lost two of their companions, Idmon, and Typhis their pilot. After they had left this coast, they were driven upon the island of Arecia, where they found the children of Phryxus, whom Æetes, their grandfather, had sent to Greece to take possession of their father's kingdom. From this island they at last arrived safe at Æa, the capital of the Colchis. Jason explained the cause of his voyage to Æetes; but the conditions on which he was to recover the golden fleece were so hard, that the Argonauts must have perished in the attempt, had not Meda, the king's daughter, fallen in love with their leader. She had a conference with Jason, and after mutual oaths of fidelity in the temple of Hecate, Medea pledged herself to deliver the Argonauts from her father's hard conditions, if Jason married her, and carried her with him to Greece. He was to tame two bulls, which had brazen feet and horns, and which vomited clouds of fire and smoke, and to tie them to a plough made of adamant stone, and to plough a field of two acres of ground never before cultivated. After this he was to sow in the plain the teeth of a dragon, from which an armed multitude were to rise up, and to be all destroyed by his hands. This done, he was to kill an ever-watchful dragon, which was at the bottom of the tree on which the golden fleece was suspended. All these labours were to be performed in one day; and Medea's assistance, whose knowledge of herbs, magic, and potions, was unparalleled, easily extricated Jason from all danger, to the astonishment and terror of his companions, and of Æetes, and the people of Colchis, who had assembled to be spectators of this wonderful action. He tamed the bulls with ease, ploughed the field, sowed the dragon's teeth, and when the armed men sprang from the earth, he threw a stone in the midst of them, and they immediately turned their weapons one against the other, till they all perished. After this he went to the dragon, and by means of enchanted herbs, and a draught which Medea had given him, he lulled the monster to sleep, and obtained the golden fleece, and immediately set sail with Medea. He was soon pursued by Absyrtus, the king's son, who came up to them, and was seized and murdered by Jason and Medea. The mangled limbs of Absyrtus were strewed in the way through which Æetes was to pass, that his farther pursuit might be stopped. After the murder of Absyrtus, they entered the Palus Mæotis; and by pursuing their course towards the left, according to the foolish account of poets who were ignorant of geography, they came to the island Peucestes, and to that of Circe. Here Circe informed Jason that the cause of all his calamities arose from the murder of Absyrtus, of which she refused to expiate him. Soon after, they entered the Mediterranean by the columns of Hercules, and passed the straits of Charybdis and Scylla, where they must have perished, had not Tethys, the mistress of Peleus, one of the Argonauts, delivered them. They were preserved from the Sirens by the eloquence of Orpheus, and arrived in the island of the Phæacians, where they met the enemy's fleet, which had continued their pursuit by a different course. It was therefore resolved that Medea should be restored, if she had not been actually married to Jason; but the wife of Alcinous, the king of the country, being appointed umpire between the Colchians and Argonauts, had the marriage privately consummated by night, and declared that the claims of Æetes to Medea were now void. From Phæacia the Argonauts came to the bay of Ambracia, whence they were driven by a storm upon the coast of Africa, and, after many disasters, at last came in sight of the promontory of Melea, in the Peloponnesus, where Jason was purified of the murder of Absyrtus, and soon after arrived safe in Thessaly. Apollonius Rhodius gives another account equally improbable. He says that they sailed from the Euxine up one of the mouths of the Danube, and that Absyrtus pursued them by entering another mouth of the river. After they had continued their voyage for some leagues, the waters decreased, and they were obliged to carry the ship Argo across the country to the Adriatic, upwards of 150 miles. Here they met with Absyrtus, who had pursued the same measures, and conveyed his ships in like manner over the land. Absyrtus was immediately put to death; and soon after the beam of Dodona (Vid. Argo) gave an oracle, that Jason should never return home if he was not previously purified of the murder. Upon this they sailed to the island of Æa, where Circe, who was the sister of Æetes, expiated him without knowing who he was. There is a third tradition, which maintains, that they returned to Colchis a second time, and visited many places of Asia. This famous expedition has been celebrated in the ancient ages of the world; it has employed the pen of many writers, and among the historians, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Apollodorus, and Justin; and among the poets, Onomacritus, more generally called Orpheus, Apollonius Rhodius, Pindar, and Valerius Flaccus, have extensively given an account of its most remarkable particulars. The number of the Argonauts is not exactly known. Apollodorus and Diodorus say that they were 54. Tzetzes admits the number of 50, but Apollodorus mentions only 45. The following list is drawn from the various authors who have made mention of the Argonautic expedition. Jason, son of Æson, as is well known, was the chief. His companions were Acastus, son of Pelias, Actor, son of Hippasus, Admetus, son of Pheres, Æsculapius, son of Apollo, Ætalides, son of Mercury and Eupoleme, Almenus, son of Mars, Amphiaraus, son of Œcleus, Amphidamus, son of Aleus, Amphion, son of Hyperasius, Anceus, a son of Lycurgus, and another of the same name, Areus, Argus, the builder of the ship Argo, Argus, son of Phryxus, Armenus, Ascalaphus, son of Mars, Asterion, son of Cometes, Asterius, son of Neleus, Augeas, son of Sol, Atalanta, daughter of Schœneus, disguised in a man's dress, Autolycus, son of Mercury, Azorus, Buphagus, Butes, son of Teleon, Calais, son of Boreas, Canthus, son of Abas, Castor, son of Jupiter, Ceneus, son of Elatus, Cepheus, son of Aleus, Cius, Clytius, and Iphitus, sons of Eurythus, Coronus, Deucalion, son of Minos, Echion, son of Mercury and Antianira, Ergynus, son of Neptune, Euphemus, son of Neptune and Macionassa, Eribotes, Euryalus, son of Cisteus, Eurydamas and Eurythion, sons of Iras, Eurytus, son of Mercury, Glaucus, Hercules, son of Jupiter, Idas, son of Aphareus, Ialmenus, son of Mars, Idman, son of Abas, Iolaus, son of Iphiclus, Iphiclus, son of Thestius, Iphiclus, son of Phylacus, Iphis, son of Alector, Lynceus, son of Aphareus, Iritus, son of Naubolus, Laertes, son of Arcesius, Laocoon, Leodatus, son of Bias, Leitus, son of Alector, Meleager, son of Œneus, Menœtius, son of Actor, Mopsus, son of Amphycus, Nauplius, son of Neptune, Neleus, the brother of Peleus, Nestor, son of Neleus, Oileus, the father of Ajax, Orpheus, son of Œager, Palemon, son of Ætolius, Peleus and Telamon, sons of Æacus, Periclimenes, son of Neleus, Peneleus, son of Hipalmus, Philoctetes, son of Pœan, Phlias, Pollux, son of Jupiter, Polyphemus, son of Elates, Pœas, son of Thaumacus, Phanus, son of Bacchus, Phalerus, son of Alcon, Phocas and Priasus, sons of Ceneus, one of the Lapithæ, Talaus, Tiphus, son of Aginus, Staphilus, son of Bacchus, two of the name of Iphitus, Theseus, son of Ægeus, with his friend Pirithous. Among these Æsculapius was physician, and Typhis was pilot.

Argus, I. a son of Arestor, whence he is often called Arestorides. He married Ismene, the daughter of the Asopus. As he had a hundred eyes, of which only two were asleep at one time, Juno set him to watch Io, whom Jupiter had changed into a heifer; but Mercury, by order of Jupiter, slew him by lulling all his eyes asleep with the sound of his lyre. Juno put the eyes of Argus on the tail of the peacock, a bird sacred to her divinity. Moschus. Idyl.—*Ovid. Ariadne, daughter of Minos 2d, king of Crete, by Pasiphae, fell in love with Theseus, who was shut up in the labyrinth to be devoured by the Minotaur, and gave him a clew of thread, by which he extricated himself from the difficult windings of his confinement. After he had conquered the Minotaur, he carried her away according to the promise he had made, and married her; but when he arrived at the island of Naxos he forsook her, though she was already pregnant, and repaid his love with the most endearing tenderness. Ariadne, upon being abandoned by Theseus, hung herself, according to some; but Plutarch says that she lived many years after. According to some writers, Bacchus loved her after Theseus had forsaken her, and gave her a crown of seven stars, which, after her death, was made a constellation. The Argives showed Ariadne's tomb, and when one of their temples was repaired, her ashes were found in an earthen urn. Homer, Od. 11, v. 320, says, that Diana detained Ariadne at Naxos. Plut. in Thes.—Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 2. Heroid. 10. De Art. Am. 2, Fast. 3, v. 462.—*Catull. de Nupt. Arion, I, a famous lyric poet and musician, son of Cyclos, of Methymna, in the island of Lesbos. He went into Italy with Periander, tyrant of Corinth, where he obtained immense riches by his profession. Some time after he wished to revisit his native country; and the sailors of the ship in which he embarked resolved to murder him, to obtain the riches which he was carrying to Lesbos. Arion, seeing them inflexible in their resolutions, begged that he might be permitted to play some melodious tune; and as soon as he had finished it, he threw himself into the sea. A number of dolphins had been attracted round the ship by the sweetness of his music; and it is said that one of them carried him safe on his back to Tænarus, whence he hastened to the court of Periander, who ordered all the sailors to be crucified at their return. Hygin. fab. 194.—Herodot. 1, c. 23 and 24.—*Ælian. de Nat. A horse, sprung from Ceres and Neptune, which had the power of speech, the feet on the right side like those of a man, and the rest of the body like a horse. Arion was brought up by the Nereides, who often harnessed him to his father's chariot, which he drew over the sea with uncommon swiftness. Neptune gave him to Copreus, who presented him to Hercules. Adrastus, king of Argos, received him as a present from Hercules, and with this wonderful animal he won the prize at the Nemæan games. Paus. 8, c. 25.—Propert. 2, el. 34, v. 37.—Apollod. 3, c. 6.

Aristæus, son of Apollo and the nymph Cyrene, was born in the deserts of Libya, and brought up by the Seasons, and fed upon nectar and ambrosia. His fondness for hunting procured him the surname of Nomus and Agreus. After he had travelled over the greatest part of the world, Aristæus came to settle in Greece, where he married Autonoe, the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he had a son called Actæon. He fell in love with Eurydice, the wife of Orpheus, and pursued her in the fields. She was stung by a serpent that lay in the grass, and died, for which the gods destroyed all the bees of Aristæus. He succeeded, however, in appeasing the manes of Eurydice by the instruction of Proteus, and his bees were restored to him. Some authors say, that Aristæus had the care of Bacchus when young, and that he was initiated in the mysteries of this god. Aristæus went to live on mount Hæmus, where he died. He was, after death, worshipped as a demi-god. Aristæus is said to have learned from the nymphs the cultivation of olives, and the management of bees, &c. which he communicated to the rest of mankind. *Virg. Artemisia. Vid. Part II.

Arueris, a god of the Egyptians, son of Isis and Osiris. According to some accounts, Osiris and Isis were married together in their mother's womb, and Isis was pregnant of Arueris before she was born.

Aruntius, I. a Roman who ridiculed the rites of Bacchus, for which the god inebriated him to such a degree that he offered violence to his daughter Medullina. Plut. in Parall.——II. A man who wrote an account of the Punic wars in the style of Sallust, in the reign of Augustus. Tacit. Ann. 1.—Senec. ep. 14.——III. Another Latin writer. Senec. de Benef. 6.——IV. Paterculus. Vid. Phalaris. Plut. in Parall.——V. Stella, a poet descended of a consular family in the age of Domitian.

Ascalaphus, I. a son of Mars and Astyoche, who was among the Argonauts, and went to the Trojan war at the head of the Orchomenians, with his brother Ialmenus. He was killed by Deiphobus. Homer. Il. 2, v. 13, l. 9, v. 82, l 13, v. 518.——II. A son of Acheron by Gorgyra or Orphne. When Ceres had obtained from Jupiter her daughter's freedom and return upon earth, provided she had eaten nothing in the kingdom of Pluto, Ascalaphus discovered that she had eaten some pomegranates from a tree; upon which Proserpine was so displeased with Ascalaphus, that she sprinkled water on his head, and immediately turned him into an owl. Apollod. 1, c. 5, l. 2, c. 5.—*Ovid. ASCANIUS. Vid. Part II.

ASIUS, a son of Dymas, brother of Hecuba. He assisted Priam in the Trojan war, and was killed by Idomeneus. Homer. Il. 2, v. 342, l. 12, v. 95, l. 13, v. 384.

ASŌPUS, a son of Neptune, who gave his name to a river of Peloponnesus. Three of his daughters are particularly celebrated, Ægina, Salamis, and Ismene. Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 12.—Paus. 2, c. 12.

ASPLĒDON, a son of Neptune by the nymph Midea. He gave his name to a city of Bœotia, whose inhabitants went to the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2, v. 18.—Paus. 9, c. 38.

ASSARĂCUS. Vid. Part II.

ASTARTE, a powerful divinity of Syria, the same as the Venus of the Greeks, the daughter of Uranus, and mother of the seven Titanides. She had a famous temple at Hierapolis in Syria, which was served by 300 priests, who were always employed in offering sacrifices. She is said to have consecrated a star which had fallen from heaven in the city of Tyre, the brilliancy of which gave light to her temple. Astarte has been identified with other goddesses. In the sacred writings she is called Ashtoreth, the goddess of the Sidonians, to which people, with the other Phœnicians, she was an original deity. Being also the wife of Adonis, she is considered to be the same as Isis, the wife of the Egyptian Osiris, because Adonis and Osiris are the same. She was worshipped with peculiar veneration and with the greatest pomp at Ascalon. Lucian. de Dea Syria.—Cic. de Nat. D.—Judges xi. 5 and 33.

ASTĔRIA, I. a daughter of Ceus, one of the Titans, by Phœbe, daughter of Cœlus and Terra. She married Perses, son of Crius, by whom she had the celebrated Hecate. She enjoyed for a long time the favour of Jupiter, under the form of an eagle; but falling under his displeasure, she was changed into a quail, called Ortyx by the Greeks; whence the name of Ortygia, given to that island in the Archipelago where she retired. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 4.—Hygin. fab. 58.—Apollod. 1, c. 2, &c.——II. One of the daughters of Atlas, mother of Œnomaus, king of Pisa. Hygin. fab. 250.

ASTĔRION, and ASTĔRIUS, I. a river god, father of Eubœa, Prosymna, and Acræa, who murdered the goddess Juno. Paus. 2, c. 17.——II. A son of Minos 2d, king of Crete, by Pasiphae. He was killed by Theseus, though he was thought the strongest of his age. Apollodorus supposes him to be the same as the famous Minotaur. According to some, Asterion was son of Teutamus, one of the descendants of Æolus; and they say that he was surnamed Jupiter, because he had carried away Europa, by whom he had Minos the 1st. Diod. 4.—Apollod. 3.—Paus. 2, c. 31.

ASTĔROPE, and ASTEROPĒA, I. one of the Pleiades, who were beloved by the gods and most illustrious heroes, and made constellations after death.——II. A daughter of Pelias, king of Iolchos, who assisted her sisters to kill her father, whom Medea promised to restore to life. Her grave was seen in Arcadia in the time of Pausanias, 8, c. 11.

ASTEROPÆUS, a king of Pæonia, son of Pelegon. He assisted Priam in the Trojan war, and was killed, after a brave resistance, by Achilles. Homer. Il. 17, &c.

ASTRÆA, a daughter of Astræus, king of Arcadia, or, according to others, of Titan, Saturn's brother, by Aurora. Some make her daughter of Jupiter and Themis, and others consider her the same as Rhea, wife of Saturn. She was called Justice, of which virtue she was the goddess. She lived upon the earth, as the poets mention, during the golden age, which is often called the age of Astrea; but the wickedness and impiety of mankind drove her to heaven in the brazen and iron ages, and she was placed among the constellations of the zodiac under the name of Virgo. She is represented as a virgin, with a stern but majestic countenance, holding a pair of scales in one hand and a sword in the other. *Senec. in Octav.—Ovid. ASTYCRATIA, I. the daughter of Æolus. Homer. Il.——II. A daughter of Amphion and Niobe.

ASTYDĂMIA, or ASTYADAMIA, I. a daughter of Amyntor, king of Orchomenos, in Bœotia, married Acastus, son of Pelias, who was king of Iolchos. Vid. Peleus. She is called by some Hippolyte, and by others Cretheis. Apollod. 3, c. 13.—Pindar. Nem. 4.——II. A daughter of Ormenus, carried away by Hercules, by whom she had Tlepolemus. *Ovid. ASTŸLUS, one of the centaurs, who had the knowledge of futurity. He advised his brothers not to make war against the Lapithæ. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 338.

ASTYNŌME, I. a daughter of Amphion.——II. Of Talaus. Hygin. Vid. Chryses.

ASTYŌCHE, and ASTYOCHĪA, I. a daughter of Actor, who had by Mars, Ascalaphus and Ialmenus, who were at the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2, v. 20.——II. A daughter of Amphion and Niobe. Apollod. 3, c. 4.——III. A daughter of the Simois, who married Erichthonius. Id. 3, c. 12.——IV. The wife of Strophius, sister to Agamemnon. Hygin.

ATALANTA, a daughter of Schœneus, king of Scyros. According to some she was the daughter of Jasus or Jasius, by Clymene; but others say that Menalion was her father. This uncertainty as to the name of her father, has led some mythologists to maintain that there were two persons of that name. Atalanta was born in Arcadia, and, according to Ovid, she determined to live in perpetual celibacy; but her beauty gained her many admirers, and to free herself from their importunities, she proposed to run a race with them. They were to run without arms, and she was to carry a dart in her hand. Her lovers were to start first, and whoever arrived at the goal before her, would be made her husband; but all those whom she overtook, were to be killed by the dart with which she had armed herself. Many of her suiters perished in the attempt, till Hippomenes, the son of Macareus, proposed himself as her admirer. Venus had presented him with three golden apples from the garden of the Hesperides, or, according to others, from an orchard in Cyprus; and as soon as he had started in the course, he artfully threw down the apples at some distance one from the other. While Atalanta stopped to gather the apples, Hippomenes hastened on his course, arrived first at the goal, and obtained Atalanta in marriage. These two lovers, impatient to consummate their nuptials, entered the temple of Cybele; and the goddess was so offended at their impiety, that she changed them into two lions. Apollodorus says that Atalanta's father was desirous of raising male issue, and that therefore she was exposed to wild beasts as soon as born. She was, however, suckled by a she-bear, and preserved by shepherds. She killed two centaurs, Hyleus and Rhecus, who attempted her virtue. She was present at the hunting of the Calydonian boar, which she first wounded, and received the head as a present from Meleager, who was enamoured of her. She was also at the games instituted in honour of Pelias, where she conquered Peleus. Apollod. 1, c. 8, l. 3, c. 9, &c.—Paus. 1, c. 36, 45, &c.—Hygin. fab. 99, 174, 185, 270.—*Ælian. V. Atargătis, a divinity among the Syrians, represented as a Siren. She is considered by some the same as Venus, honoured by the Assyrians under the name of Astarte. Strab. 16.

Ate, the goddess of evil, and daughter of Jupiter. She raised such jealousy and sedition in heaven among the gods, that Jupiter banished her for ever from heaven, and sent her to dwell on earth, where she incited mankind to wickedness, and sowed commotions among them, Homer. Il. 19. She is the same as the Discord of the Latins.

Athămas, a king of Thebes, in Bœotia, was son of Æolus. He married Themisto, whom some call Nephele, and Pindar, Demotice, and by her he had Phryxus and Helle. Some time after, on pretence that Nephele was subject to fits of madness, he married Ino, the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he had two sons, Learchus and Melicerta. Ino became jealous of the children of Nephele; because they were to ascend their father's throne in preference to her own, therefore she resolved to destroy them; but they escaped from her fury to Colchis, on a golden ram. Vid. Phryxus and Argonautæ. According to the Greek scholiast of Lycophron, v. 22, Ino attempted to destroy the corn of the country; and the soothsayer, at her instigation, told Athamas, that before the earth would yield its usual increase, he must sacrifice one of the children of Nephele to the gods. The credulous father led Phryxus to the altar, where he was saved by Nephele. The prosperity of Ino was displeasing to Juno, more particularly because she was descended from Venus. The goddess therefore sent Tisiphone, one of the furies, to the house of Athamas, who became inflamed with such sudden fury, that he took Ino to be a lioness, and her two children to be whelps. In this fit of madness he snatched Learchus from her, and killed him; upon which Ino fled with Melicerta, and with him in her arms, she threw herself into the sea, and was changed into a sea deity, called Leucothoe. After this, Athamas recovered his senses; and as he was without children, he adopted Coronus and Aliartus, the sons of Thersander his nephew. Hygin. fab. 1, 2, 5, 239.—Apollod. 1, c. 7 and 9.—*Ovid. Athēna, the name of Minerva among the Greeks; and also among the Egyptians, before Cecrops had introduced the worship of the goddess into Greece. Paus. 1, c. 2.

Atlantides, the daughters of Atlas, seven in number, Maia, Electra, Taygeta, Asterope, Merope, Alcyone, and Celæno. They married some of the gods and most illustrious heroes, and their children were founders of many nations and cities. The Atlantides were called nymphs, and even goddesses, on account of their great intelligence and knowledge. The name of Hesperides was also given them on account of their mother Hesperis. They were made constellations after death. Vid. Pleiades.

Atlantis, a celebrated fabulous island, mentioned by the ancients, of which the supposed situation is unknown. Vid. Part I.

Atlas, one of the Titans, son of Japetus and Clymene, one of the Oceanides. He was brother to Epimetheus, Prometheus, and Menœtius. His mother's name, according to Apollodorus, was Asia. He married Pleione, daughter of Oceanus, or Hesperis, according to others, by whom he had seven daughters, called Atlantides. Vid. Atlantides. He was king of Mauretania, and master of a thousand flocks of every kind, as also of beautiful gardens, abounding in every species of fruit, which he had intrusted to the care of a dragon. Perseus, after the conquest of the Gorgons, passed by the palace of Atlas, and demanded hospitality. The king, who was informed by an oracle of Themis that he should be dethroned by one of the descendants of Jupiter, refused to receive him, and even offered him violence. Perseus, who was unequal in strength, showed him Medusa's head, and Atlas was instantly changed into a large mountain. This mountain, which runs across the deserts of Africa, east and west, is so high that the ancients have imagined that the heavens rested on its top, and that Atlas supported the world on his shoulders. Hyginus says that Atlas assisted the giants in their wars against the gods, for which Jupiter compelled him to bear the heavens on his shoulders. The fable that Atlas supported the heavens on his back, arises from his fondness for astronomy, and his often frequenting elevated places and mountains, whence he might observe the heavenly bodies. The daughters of Atlas were carried away by Busiris, king of Egypt, but redeemed by Hercules, who received as a reward from the father the knowledge of astronomy, and a celestial globe. This knowledge Hercules communicated to the Greeks; whence the fable has further said, that he eased for some time the labours of Atlas, by taking upon his shoulders the weight of the heavens. According to some authors there were two other persons of that name, a king of Italy, father of Electra, and a king of Arcadia, father of Maia, the mother of Mercury. *Virg. ATRAX, a son of Ætolus, or, according to others, of the river Peneus. He was king of Thessaly, and built a town which he called Atrax or Atracia. He was father to Hippodamia, who married Pirithous, and whom we must not confound with the wife of Pelops, who bore the same name. Propert. 1, el. 8, v. 25.—Stat. 1. Theb. v. 106.—*Ovid. AVENTĪNUS, a son of Hercules, by Rhea, who assisted Turnus against Æneas, and distinguished himself by his valour. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 657.

AUGA, and AUGE, and AUGEA, daughter of Aleus, king of Tegea, by Neæra. Vid. Telephus.

AUGIAS, and AUGEAS, son of Eleus or Elius, was one of the Argonauts, and afterwards ascended the throne of Elis. He had an immense number of oxen and goats, and the stables in which they were kept had never been cleaned, so that the task seemed an impossibility to any man. Hercules undertook it on promise of receiving as a reward the tenth part of the herds of Augias, or something equivalent. The hero changed the course of the river Alpheus, or, according to others, of the Peneus, which immediately carried away the dung and filth from the stables. Augias refused the promised recompense, on pretence that Hercules had made use of artifice, and had not experienced any labour or trouble; and he further drove his own son Phyleus from his kingdom, because he supported the claims of the hero. The refusal was a declaration of war. Hercules conquered Elis, put to death Augias, and gave the crown to Phyleus. Pausanias says, 5, c. 2 and 3, that Hercules spared the life of Augias for the sake of his son, and that Phyleus went to settle in Dulichium; and that at the death of Augias, his other son, Agasthenes, succeeded to the throne. Augias received, after his death, the honours which were generally paid to a hero. Augias has been called the son of Sol, because Elius signifies the sun. The proverb of Augean stable is now applied to an impossibility. Hygin. fab. 14, 30, 157.—Plin. 17, c. 9.—Strab. 8.—Apollod. 2.

AURŌRA, a goddess, daughter of Hyperion and Thia or Thea, or, according to others, of Titan or Terra. Some say that Pallas, son of Crius, and brother to Perses, was her father; hence her surname of Pallantias. She married Astræus, and was mother of the Winds, the Stars, &c. Her amours with Tithonus and Cephalus are also famous; by the former she had Memnon, and Æmathion, and Phæton by the latter. Vid. Cephalus and Tithonis. She had also an intrigue with Orion, whom she carried to the island of Delos, where he was killed by Diana's arrows. Aurora is generally represented by the poets drawn in a rose-coloured chariot, and opening with her rosy fingers the gates of the east, pouring the dew upon the earth, and making the flowers grow. Her chariot is generally drawn by white horses, and she is covered with a veil. Nox and Somnus fly before her, and the constellations of heaven disappear at her approach. She always sets out before the sun, and is the forerunner of his rising. The Greeks call her Eos Homer. Il. 8, Od. 10. Hymn. in Vener.—Ovid. Met. 3, 9, 15.—Apollod. 1, 3.—*Virg. AUSON, a son of Ulysses and Calypso, from whom the Ausones, a people of Italy, are descended.

AUSTER, one of the winds blowing from the south, whose breath was pernicious to flowers as well as to health. He was parent of rain. Virg. Ecl. 2, v. 58. Vid. Venti.

AUTOCTHŌNES. Vid. Part II.

AUTŌLYCUS, a son of Mercury by Chione, a daughter of Dædalion. He was one of the Argonauts. His craft as a thief has been greatly celebrated. He stole the flocks of his neighbours, and mingled them with his own, after he changed their marks. He did the same to Sisyphus son of Æolus; but Sisyphus was as crafty as Autolycus, and he knew his own oxen by a mark which he had made under their feet. Autolycus was so pleased with the artifice of Sisyphus, that he immediately formed an intimacy with him, and even permitted him freely to enjoy the company of his daughter Anticlea. Hygin. fab. 200, &c.—Ovid. Met. 1, fab. 8.—Apollod. 1.—Homer. Od 14.

AUTOMĒDON, a son of Dioreus, he went to the Trojan war with ten ships. He was the charioteer of Achilles, after whose death he served Pyrrhus in the same capacity. Homer. Il. 9, 16, &c.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 477.

AUTONOE, I. a daughter of Cadmus, who married Aristæus, by whom she had Actæon, often called Autoneius heros. The death of her son (Vid. Actæon) was so painful to her, that she retired from Bœotia to Megara, where she soon after died. Paus. 1, c. 44.—Hygin. fab. 179.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 720.——II. One of the Danaides. Apollod. 2.

AZAN, a son of Arcas, king of Arcadia, by Erato, one of the Dryades. He divided his father's kingdom with his brothers Aphidas and Elatus, and called his share Azania. There was in Azania a fountain called Clitorius, whose waters gave a dislike for wine to those who drank them. Vitruv. 8, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 322.—Paus. 8, c. 4.

B.

BACCHIĀDÆ, a Corinthian family descended from Bacchis, daughter of Dionysius. In their nocturnal orgies, they, as some report, tore to pieces Actæon, son of Melissus, which so enraged the father, that before the altar he entreated the Corinthians to revenge the death of his son, and he immediately threw himself into the sea. Upon this the Bacchiadæ were banished, and went to settle in Sicily, between Pachynum and Pelorus. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 407.—Strab. 8.

BACCHUS, was son of Jupiter and Semele, the daughter of Cadmus. After she had enjoyed the company of Jupiter, Semele was deceived, and perished by the artifice of Juno. This goddess assumed the shape of Beroe, Semele's nurse, and persuaded her that she ought to beg of Jupiter to come to her with the same majesty as he courted the embraces of Juno. The artifice succeeded, and when Jupiter promised his mistress whatever she asked, Semele required him to visit her with all the divinity of a god. Jupiter was unable to violate his oath, and Semele, unable to bear the majesty of Jupiter, was consumed and reduced to ashes. The child, of which she had been pregnant for seven months, was with difficulty saved from the flames, and put in his father's thigh, where he remained the full time he naturally was to have been in his mother's womb. From this circumstance Bacchus has been called Bimater. According to some, Dirce, a nymph of the Achelous, saved him from the flames. Ovid says, that after his birth he was brought up by his aunt Ino, and afterwards intrusted to the care of the nymphs of Nysa. Lucian supposes that Mercury carried him, as soon as born, to the nymphs of Nysa; and Apollonius says, that he was carried by Mercury to a nymph in the island of Eubœa, whence he was driven by the power of Juno, who was the chief deity of the place. Some support that Naxos can boast of the place of his education, under the nymphs Philia, Coronis, and Clyda. Pausanias relates a tradition which prevailed in the town of Brasiæ in Peloponnesus; and accordingly mentions that Cadmus, as soon as he heard of his daughter's amours, shut her up, with her child lately born, in a coffer, and exposed them on the sea. The coffer was carried safe by the waves to the coast of Brasiæ; but Semele was found dead and the child alive. Semele was honoured with a magnificent funeral, and Bacchus properly educated. This diversity of opinion shows that there were many of the same name. Diodorus speaks of three, and Cicero of a greater number; but among them all, the son of Jupiter and Semele seems to have obtained the merit of the rest. Bacchus is the Osiris of the Egyptians, and his history is drawn from the Egyptian traditions concerning that ancient king. Bacchus assisted the gods in their war against the giants, and was cut to pieces; but the son of Semele was not then born: this tradition, therefore, is taken from the history of Osiris, who was killed by his brother Typhon, and the worship of Osiris has been introduced by Orpheus into Greece under the name of Bacchus. In his youth he was taken asleep in the island of Naxos, and carried away by some mariners, whom he changed into dolphins, except the pilot, who had expressed some concern at his misfortune. His expedition into the East is most celebrated. He marched at the head of an army composed of men as well as of women, all inspired with divine fury, and armed with thyrsuses, cymbals, and other musical instruments. The leader was drawn in a chariot by a lion and a tiger, and was accompanied by Pan and Silenus, and all the satyrs. His conquests were easy and without bloodshed; the people easily submitted, and gratefully elevated to the rank of a god the hero who taught them the use of the vine, the cultivation of the earth, and the manner of making honey. Amidst his benevolence to mankind, he was relentless in punishing all want of respect to his divinity; and the punishment he inflicted on Pentheus, Agave, Lycurgus, &c., is well known. He has received the names of Liber, Bromius, Lyæus, Evan, Thyonæus, Psilas, &c., which are mostly derived from the places where he received adoration, or from the ceremonies observed in his festivals. As he was the god of vintage, of wine, and of drinkers, he is generally represented crowned with vine and ivy leaves, with a thyrsus in his hand. His figure is that of an effeminate young man, to denote the joy which commonly prevails at feasts; and sometimes that of an old man, to teach us that wine taken immoderately will enervate us, and consume our health, render us loquacious and childish like old men, and unable to keep secrets. The panther is sacred to him, because he went in his expedition covered with the skin of that beast. The magpye is also his favourite bird, because in his triumphs people were permitted to speak with boldness and liberty. Bacchus is sometimes represented like an infant, holding a thyrsus and cluster of grapes, with a horn. He often appears naked, and riding upon the shoulders of Pan, or in the arms of Silenus, who was his foster-father. He also sits upon a celestial globe, bespangled with stars, and is then the same as the Sun or Osiris of Egypt. The festivals of Bacchus, generally called Orgies, Bacchanalia, or Dionysia, were introduced into Greece from Egypt by Danaus and his daughters. The infamous debaucheries which arose from the celebration of these festivals are well known. Vid. Dionysia. The amours of Bacchus are not numerous. He married Ariadne, after she had been forsaken by Theseus in the island of Naxos; and by her he had many children, among whom were Ceranus, Thoas, Œnopion, Tauropolis, &c. According to some, he was the father of Hymenæus, whom the Athenians made the god of marriage. The Egyptians sacrificed pigs to him before the doors of their houses. The fir-tree, the yew-tree, the fig-tree, the ivy, and the vind, were sacred to him; and the goat was generally sacrificed to him on account of the great propensity of that animal to destroy the vine. According to Pliny, he was the first who ever wore a crown. His beauty is compared to that of Apollo; and, like him, he is represented with fine hair loosely flowing down his shoulders, and he is said to possess eternal youth. Sometimes he has horns, either because he taught the cultivation of the earth with oxen, or because Jupiter, his father, appeared to him in the deserts of Libya under the shape of a ram, and supplied his thirsty army with water. Bacchus went down to hell to recover his mother, whom Jupiter willingly made a goddess, under the name of Thyone. The three persons of the name of Bacchus, whom Diodorus mentions, are, the one who conquered the Indies, and is surnamed the bearded Bacchus; a son of Jupiter and Proserpine, who was represented with horns; and the son of Jupiter and Semole, called the Bacchus of Thebes. Those mentioned by Cicero are, a son of Proserpine; a son of Nisus, who built Nysa; a son of Caprius, who reigned in the Indies; a son of Jupiter and the moon; and a son of Thyone and Basilēa, a daughter of Cœlus and Terra, who was mother of all the gods. Diod. 3.

Batia, a daughter of Teucer, who married Dardanus. Apollod. 3, c. 10.

Battus, a shepherd of Pylos, who promised Mercury that he would not discover his having stolen the flocks of Admetus, which Apollo tended. He violated his promise, and was turned into apumice stone. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 702.

Baubo, a woman who received Ceres when she sought her daughter all over the world, and gave her some water to quench her thirst. Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 7.

Baucis, an old woman of Phrygia, who, with her husband Philemon, lived in a small cottage, in a penurious manner, when Jupiter and Mercury travelled in disguise over Asia. The gods came to the cottage, where they received the best things it afforded; and Jupiter was so pleased with their hospitality, that he metamorphosed their dwelling into a magnificent temple, of which Baucis and her husband were made priests. After they had lived happy to an extreme old age, they died both at the same hour, according to their request to Jupiter, that one might not have the sorrow of following the other to the grave. Their bodies were changed into trees before the doors of the temple. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 631, &c.

Berbĭce, a daughter of Danaus, who is said to have spared her husband. Most authors, however, attribute that character of humanity to Hypermnestra. Vid. Danaides.

Belenus, a divinity of the Gauls, the same as the Apollo of the Greeks and the Orus of the Egyptians.

Belĭdes, a surname given to the daughters of Belus. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 463.

Belĭdes, a name applied to Palemedes, as descended from Belus. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 82.

Belisama, the name of Minerva among the Gauls, signifying queen of heaven. Cæs. Bell. Gall. 6.

Bellerŏphon, son of Glaucus, king of Ephyre, by Eurymede, was at first called Hipponous. The murder of his brother, whom some call Alcimenus or Beller, procured him the name of Bellerophon, or murderer of Beller. After this murder, Bellerophon fled to the court of Prœtus, king of Argos. As he was of a handsome appearance, the king's wife, called Antæa or Stenobœe, fell in love with him; and as he slighted her passion, she accused him before her husband of attempts upon her virtue. Prœtus, unwilling to violate the laws of hospitality, by punishing Bellerophon, sent him away to his father-in-law, Jobates, king of Lycia, and gave him a letter, in which he begged the king to punish with death a man who had so dishonourably treated his daughter. From that circumstance, all letters which are of an unfavourable tendency to the bearer, have been called letters of Bellerophon. Jobates, to satisfy his son-in-law, sent Bellerophon to conquer a horrible monster, called Chimæra, in which dangerous expedition he hoped, and was even assured, he must perish. Vid. Chimæra. But the providence of Minerva supported him, and with the aid of the winged horse Pegasus, he conquered the monster and returned victorious. After this, Jobates sent him against the Solymi, in hopes of seeing him destroyed; but he obtained another victory, and conquered afterwards the Amazons, by the king's order. At his return from this third expedition, he was attacked by a party sent against him by Jobates; but he destroyed all his assassins, and convinced the king that innocence is always protected by the gods. Upon this Jobates no longer sought to destroy his life, but gave him his daughter in marriage, and made him his successor on the throne of Lycia, as he was without male issue. Some authors have supported that he attempted to fly to heaven upon the horse Pegasus, but that Jupiter sent an insect, which stung the horse, and threw down the rider, who wandered upon the earth in the greatest melancholy and dejection till the day of his death, one generation before the Trojan war. Bellerophon had two sons, Isander, who was killed in his war against the Solymi, and Hippolochus, who succeeded to the throne after his death, besides one daughter, called Hippodamia, who had Sarpedon by Jupiter. The wife of Bellerophon is called Philonoe by Apollodorus, and Achemone by Homer. Homer. Il. 6, v. 156, &c.—Juv. 10.—Apollod. 2, c. 3, l. 3, c. 1.—Hygin. fab. 157 and 243. *P. Belus. Vid. Part II.

Bergion and Albion, two giants, sons of Neptune, who opposed Hercules as he attempted to cross the Rhone, and were killed with stones from heaven. Mela, 2, c. 5.

Beroe, I. an old woman of Epidaurus, nurse to Semele. Juno assumed her shape when she persuaded Semele not to grant her favours to Jupiter if he did not appear in the majesty of a god. Ovid Met. 3, v. 278.——II. The wife of Doryclus, whose form was assumed by Iris at the instigation of Juno, when she advised the Trojan women to burn the fleet of Æneas in Sicily. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 620.——III. One of the Oceanides, attendant upon Cyrene. Virg. G. 4, v. 341.

Bia, a daughter of Pallas by Styx. Apollod. 1, c. 1.

Bianor, I. a son of Tiberius and Manto, the daughter of Tiresias, who received the surname of Ocnus, and reigned over Etruria. He built a town, which he called Mantua, after his mother's name. His tomb was seen in the age of Virgil on the road between Mantua and Andes. Virg. Ecl. 9, v. 60.——II. A centaur, killed by Theseus. Ovid Met. 12, v. 342.

Bias, son of Amythaon and Idomene, was king of Argos, and brother to the famous soothsayer Melampus. He fell in love with Perone, daughter of Neleus, king of Pylos; but the father refused to give his daughter in marriage before he received the oxen of Iphiclus. Melampus, at his brother's request, went to sieze the oxen, and was caught in the fact. He, however, one year after, received his liberty from Iphiclus, who presented him with his oxen as a reward for his great services. Bias received the oxen from his brother, and obliged Neleus to give him his daughter in marriage. Homer. Od. 11.—Paus. 2, c. 6 and 18, l. 4, c. 34.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.

Biformis, (two forms,) a surname of Bacchus and Janus. Bacchus received it because he changed himself into an old woman to fly from the persecution of Juno, or perhaps because he was represented sometimes as a young, and sometimes as an old man.

Bifrons, a surname of Janus, because he was represented with two faces among the Romans, as acquainted with the past and future. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 180.

Bimater, a surname of Bacchus, which signifies that he had two mothers, because, when he was taken from his mother's womb, he was placed in the thigh of his father Jupiter. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 12.

Biston, son of Mars and Callirhoe, built Bistonia, in Thrace, whence the Thracians are often called Bistones. Herodot. 7, c. 110.—Plin. 4, c. 14.—Lucan. 7, v. 569.

Bolina, a virgin of Achaia, who rejected the addresses of Apollo, and threw herself into the sea to avoid his importunities. The god made her immortal. There is a city which bears her name in Achaia. Paus. 7, c. 23.

Bona Dea, a name given to Ops, Vesta, Cybele, Rhea, by the Greeks; and by the Latins, to Fauna, or Fuata. This goddess was so chaste, that no man but her husband saw her after her marriage; from which reason, her festivals were celebrated only in the night by the Roman matrons in the houses of the highest officers of the state, and all the statues of men were carefully covered with a veil where the ceremonies were observed. In the latter ages of the republic, however, the sanctity of these mysteries was profaned by the intrusion of men. Juv. 6, v. 313.—Propert. 4, el. 10, v. 25.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 3, v. 637.

Bonus Eventus, a Roman deity, whose worship was first introduced by the peasants. He was represented holding a cup in his right hand, and in his left, ears of corn. Varro de R. R. 1.—Plin. 34, c. 8.

Boötes, a northern constellation near the Ursa Major, also called Bubulcus and Arctophylax. Some suppose it to be Icarus, the father of Erigone, who was killed by shepherds for inebriating them. Others maintain that it is Arcas, whom Jupiter placed in heaven. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 405.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 42.

Bootus, and Bœotus, a son of Neptune and Melanippe, exposed by his mother, but preserved by shepherds. Hygin. fab. 186.

Boreades, the descendants of Boreas, who long possessed the supreme power and the priesthood in the island of the Hyperboreans. Diod. 1 and 2.

Boreas, the name of the north wind blowing from the Hyperborean mountains. According to the poets he was son of Astræus and Aurora, but others make him son of the Strymon. He was passionately fond of Hyacinthus, (Vid. Hyacinthus,) and carried away Orithyia, who refused to receive his addresses, and by her he had Zetes and Calais, Cleopatra and Chione. He was worshipped as a deity, and represented with wings and white hair. The Athenians dedicated altars to him, and to the winds, when Xerxes invaded Europe. Homer. Il. 20, v. 222.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 379.—Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Herodot. 7, c. 189.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 700.

Branchiles, a surname of Apollo.

Branchus, a youth of Miletus, son of Smicrus, beloved by Apollo, who gave him the power of prophecy. He gave oracles at Didyme, which became inferior to none of the Grecian oracles, except Delphi, and which exchanged the name of Didymean for that of Branchidæ. The temple, according to Strabo, was set on fire by Xerxes, who took possession of the riches it contained, and transported the people into Sogdiana, where they built a city, which was afterwards destroyed by Alexander. Strab. 15.—Stat. Theb. 3, v. 479.—Lucan. de Domo.

Briareus, I. a famous giant, son of Cœlus and Terra, who had 100 hands and 50 heads, and was called by men Ægeon, and only by the gods, Briareus. When Juno, Neptune, and Minerva conspired to dethrone Jupiter, Briareus ascended the heavens, and seated himself next to him, and so terrified the conspirators by his fierce and threatening looks, that they desisted. He assisted the giants in the war against the gods, and was thrown under mount Ætna, according to some accounts. Hesiod. Theog. v. 148.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.—Homer. Il. 1, v. 403. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 287, l. 18, v. 565.——II. A Cyclop, made judge between Apollo and Neptune, in their dispute about the isthmus and promontory of Corinth. He gave the former to Neptune, and the latter to Apollo. Paus. 2, c. 1.

Briseis. Vid. Part II.

Brises. Vid. Part II.

Briseus, a surname of Bacchus, from his nurse Brisa, or his temple at Brisa, a promontory at Lesbos. Persius, 1, v. 76.

Britomartis, I. a beautiful nymph of Crete, daughter of Jupiter and Charme, who devoted herself to hunting, and became a great favourite of Diana. She was loved by Minos, who pursued her so closely, that, to avoid his importunities, she threw herself into the sea. Paus. 2, c. 30, l. 3, c. 14.——II. A surname of Diana.

Brizo, the goddess of dreams, worshipped in Delos.

Bromius, I. a surname of Bacchus, from βρεμειν, frendere, alluding to the groans which Semele uttered when consumed by Jupiter's fire. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 11.——II. A son of Ægyptus. Apollod. 2, c. 1.

Bromus, one of the centaurs. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 459.

Brontes, (thunder,) one of the Cyclops. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 425.

Brotheus, a son of Vulcan and Minerva, who burned himself to avoid the ridicule to which his deformity subjected him. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 517.

Bucolion, I. a king of Arcadia, after Laias. Paus. 8, c. 5.——II. A son of Laomedon and the nymph Calybe.——III. A son of Hercules and Prazithea. He was also called Bucolus.——IV. A son of Lycaon, king of Arcadia. Apollod. 2 and 3.

Bunæa, a surname of Juno.

Bunus, a son of Mercury and Alcidamea, who obtained the government of Corinth when Æetes went to Colchis. He built a temple to Juno. Paus. 2, c. 3 and 4.

Bupalgus, I. a son of Japetus and Thornax, killed by Diana, whose virtue he had attempted. A river of Arcadia bears his name. Paus. 8, c. 24.——II. A surname of Hercules, given him on account of his gluttony.

Bura, a daughter of Jupiter, or, according to others, of Ion and Helice, from whom Bura or Buris, once a flourishing city in the bay of Corinth, received its name. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 293. —Paus. 7, c. 25.—Strab. 1 and 8.—Diod. 15.

Busiris, a king of Egypt, son of Neptune and Libya, or Lysianassa, who sacrificed all foreigners to Jupiter with the greatest cruelty. When Hercules visited Egypt, Busiris carried him to the altar bound hand and foot. The hero soon disentangled himself, and offered the tyrant his son Amphidamas, and the ministers of his cruelty on the altar.

Butes, I. one of the descendants of Amycus, king of the Bebryces, very expert in the combat of the cestus. He came to Sicily, where he was received by Lycaste, by whom he had a son called Eryx. Lycaste, on account of her beauty, was called Venus; hence Eryx is often called the son of Venus. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 372.—— II. A son of Pandion and Zeuxippe, priest of Minerva and Neptune. He married Chthonia, daughter of Erechtheus. Apollod. 3, c. 14, &c. ——III. An arm-bearer to Anchises, and afterwards to Ascanius. Apollo assumed his shape when he descended from heaven to encourage Ascanias to fight. Butes was killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 647, l. 12, v. 632.

Byblia, a name of Venus.

Byblis, a daughter of Miletus and Cyanea. Some say that Caunus became enamoured of her; and others report, that he fled from his sister's importunities, who sought him all over Lycia and Caria, and at last sat down all bathed in tears, and was changed into a fountain of the same name. Ovid. de Art. Am. 1, v. 284.—Met. 9, v. 451.—Hygin. fab. 243.—Paus. 7, c. 5.

Byzas, a son of Neptune, king of Thrace, from whom it is said Byzantium received its name. Diod. 4.

C.

Caanthus, a son of Oceanus and Tethys. He was ordered by his father to seek his sister Malia, whom Apollo had carried away, and he burnt in revenge the ravisher's temple near the Isthmus. He was killed for his impiety by the god, and a monument raised to his memory. Paus. 9, c. 10.

Cabarnos, a deity worshipped at Paros. His priests were called Cabarni.

Cabiri, variously considered as ancient inhabitants of Bœotia, sacred priests, and deities. Some report that Prometheus, one of the Cabiri, received Ceres when in quest of Proserpine; that she intrusted to him and his son a secret, which they religiously kept. Hence the Cabiric mysteries. When the Cabiri were dispersed by the Epigoni, at the time of the Theban expedition, the few survivors united and became priests of Ceres. Others identify the Cabiri with the Curetes, Corybantes, and Dactyli; to which Faber adds the Dioscuri, Anactes, and Telchines. This writer considers the Cabiri as the same with the Arkite Titans, or the family of Noah. They were likewise denominated Lares and Penates. Hence Virgil unites the Penates with the Magni Dii, or Cabiri, and describes Augustus as bringing them into the naval battle of Actium. Another title by which the Cabiri were known, was that of the Manes; while their mother was supposed to have been called Mania. According to Faber, Mania is the Noetic ark; and the Manes, however their history may have been corrupted, are no other than the patriarch and his family. Nonnus represents the Cabiri as sons of Vulcan, and Acusilaus, the Argive, affirms that Casmilus, or Mercury, was the son of Vulcan and Cabira, and the father of the three Cabiri, from whom were born the three Cabirides; and lastly, Pherecydes mentions that the three Cabiri and the three Cabirides were the offspring of Vulcan and Cabira, the daughter of Proteus. Herodotus affirms that the worship of the Cabiri was brought to Samothrace by the Pelasgi. Traces of the Cabiric worship are found in Phœnicia, Rome, (where were altars to the Cabiri in the Circus Maximus,) and other parts of Europe and Asia. Faber's Cabiri.—Millin. Strabo. 10. —Nonni. Dionys. 14.—Æn. 3, 11, 8, 678.—Herod. 2.

Cabiria, a surname of Ceres.

Cacus, a famous robber, son of Vulcan and Medusa, represented as a three-headed monster, and as vomiting flames. He resided in Italy. He plundered the neighbouring country; and when Hercules returned from the conquest of Geryon, Cacus stole some of his cows, and dragged them backwards into his cave to prevent discovery. Hercules departed without perceiving the theft; but his oxen having lowed, were answered by the cows in the cave of Cacus, and the hero became acquainted with the loss he had sustained. He ran to the cave, attacked Cacus, and strangled him in his arms, though vomiting fire and smoke. Hercules erected an altar to Jupiter Servetor, in commemoration of this victory; and an annual festival was instituted by the inhabitants in honour of the hero who had delivered them from such a public calamity. Ovid. 1, Fast. v. 551.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 194.—Propert. 4, el. 10.—Jus. 5, 125.—Liv. 1, c. 7.—Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 9.

Cadmus, son of Agenor, king of Phœnicia, by Telephassa or Agriope, was ordered by his father to go in quest of his sister Europa, whom Jupiter had carried away, and he was never to return to Phœnicia if he did not bring her back. As his search proved fruitless, he consulted the oracle of Apollo, and was ordered to build a city where he should see a young heifer stop in the grass, and to call the country Bœotia. He found the heifer according to the directions of the oracle; and as he wished to thank the god by a sacrifice, he sent his companions to fetch water from a neighbouring grove. The waters were sacred to Mars, and guarded by a dragon, which devoured all the Phœnician's attendants. Cadmus, tired of their seeming delay, went to the place, and saw the monster still feeding on their flesh. He attacked the dragon, and overcame it by the assistance of Minerva, and sowed the teeth in a plain, upon which armed men suddenly rose up from the ground. He threw a stone in the midst of them, and they instantly turned their arms one against the other, till all perished except five, who assisted him in building his city. Soon after he married Hermoine, the daughter of Venus, with whom he lived in the greatest cordiality, and by whom he had a son, Polydorus, and four daughters, Ino, Agave, Autonoe, and Semele. Juno persecuted those children; and their well-known misfortunes so distracted Cadmus and Hermoine, that they retired to Illyricum, loaded with grief and infirm with age. They entreated the gods to remove them from the misfortunes of life, and they were immediately changed into serpents. Some explain the dragon's fable, by supposing that it was a king of the country whom Cadmus conquered by war; and the armed men rising from the field, is no more than men armed with brass, according to the ambiguous signification of a Phœnician word. Cadmus was the first who introduced the use of letters into Greece; but some maintain that the alphabet which he brought from Phœnicia was only different from that which is used by the ancient inhabitants of Greece. This alphabet consisted only of 16 letters, to which, afterwards, 8 others were added. Vid. Simonides, Epicharmus, and Palamedes. The worship of many of the Egyptian and Phœnician deities was also introduced by Cadmus, who is supposed to have come into Greece 1493 years before the Christian era, and to have died 61 years after. According to those who believe that Thebes was built at the sound of Amphion's lyre, Cadmus built only a small citadel, which he called Cadmea, and laid the foundations of a city which was finished by one of his successors. Ovid. Met. 3, fab. 1, 2, &c.—Herodot. 2, c. 49, l. 4, c. 147.—Hygin. fab. 6, 76, 155, &c.—Diod. 1, &c.—Paus. 9, c, 5, &c.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 937, &c.

Cadūceus, a rod entwined at one end by two serpents, in the form of two equal semicircles. It was the attribute of Mercury and the emblem of power, and it had been given him by Apollo in return for the lyre. Various interpretations have been put upon the two serpents round it. Some suppose them to be a symbol of Jupiter's amours with Rhea, when these two deities transformed themselves into snakes. Others say that it originates from Mercury's having appeased the fury of two serpents that were fighting, by touching them with his rod. Prudence is generally supposed to be represented by these two serpents, and the wings are the symbol of diligence; both necessary in the pursuit of business and commerce, which Mercury patronised. With it Mercury conducted to the infernal regions the souls of the dead, and could lull to sleep, and even raise to life a dead person. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 242.—Horat. 1, od. 10.

Cæcŭlus, a son of Vulcan, conceived, as some say, by his mother, when a spark of fire fell into her bosom. He was called Cæculus because his eyes were small. After a life spent in plundering and rapine, he built Prænestę; but being unable to find inhabitants, he implored Vulcan to show whether he really was his father. Upon this a flame suddenly shone among a multitude who were assembled to see some spectacle, and they were immediately persuaded to become the subjects of Cæculus. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 680, says, that he was found in the fire by shepherds, and on that account called son of Vulcan, who is the god of fire.

Cæneus, one of the Argonauts. Apollod. 1, c. 9.

Cænis, a Thessalian woman, daughter of Elatus, who obtained from Neptune the power to change her sex, and to become invulnerable. She also changed her name, and was called Cæneus. In the wars of the Lapithæ against the centaurs, she offended Jupiter, and was overwhelmed with a huge pile of wood, and changed into a bird. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 172 and 479.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 448, says, that she returned again to her pristine form.

Calchas, a celebrated soothsayer, son of Thestor. He accompanied the Greeks to Troy, in the office of highpriest; and he informed them that that city could not be taken without the aid of Achilles, that their fleet could not sail from Aulis before Iphigenia was sacrificed to Diana, and that the plague could not be stopped in the Grecian army before the restoration of Chryseis to her father. He told them also that Troy could not be taken before ten years' siege. He had received the power of divination from Apollo. Calchas was informed that as soon as he found a man more skilled than himself in divination, he must perish; and this happened near Colophon, after the Trojan war. He was unable to tell how many figs were in the branches of a certain fig-tree; and when Mopsus mentioned the exact number, Calchas died through grief. Vid. Mopsus. Homer. Il. 1, v. 69.—Æschyl. in Agam.—Eurip. in Iphig.—Paus. 1, c. 43.

Calchinia, a daughter of Leucippus. She had a son by Neptune, who inherited his grandfather's kingdom of Sicyon. Paus. 2, c. 5.

Caliadne, the wife of Egyptus. Apollod. 2, c. 1.

Calliŏpe, one of the muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne, who presided over eloquence and heroic poetry. She is said to be the mother of Orpheus by Apollo, and Horace supposes her able to play on any musical instrument. She was represented with a trumpet in her right hand, and with books in the other, which signified that her office was to take notice of the famous actions of heroes, as Clio was employed in celebrating them; and she held the three most famous epic poems of antiquity, and appeared generally crowned with laurels. She settled the dispute between Venus and Proserpine, concerning Adonis, whose company these two goddesses wished both perpetually to enjoy. Hesiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Horat. od.

Callirhŏe, I. a daughter of the Scamander, who married Troas, by whom she had Ilus, Ganymede, and Assaracus.——II. A daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, mother of Echidna, Orthos, and Cerberus, by Chrysaor. Hesiod.——III. A daughter of Lycus, tyrant of Libya, who kindly received Diomedes at his return from Troy. He abandoned her, upon which she killed herself.——IV. A daughter of the Achelous, who married Alcmæon. Vid. Alcmæon. Paus. 8, c. 24.

Callisto, and Calisto, called also Helice was daughter of Lycaon, king of Arcadia, and one of Diana's attendants. She had a son by Jupiter, called Arcas. Juno, who was jealous of Jupiter, changed Calisto into a bear; but the god, apprehensive of her being hurt by the huntsmen, made her a constellation of heaven, with her son Arcas, under the name of the bear. Ovid. Met. 2, fab. 4, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 8.—Hygin. fab. 176 and 177.—Paus. 8, c. 3.

Calyce, I. a daughter of Æolus, son of Helenus and Enaretta, daughter of Deimachus. She had Endymion, king of Elis, by Ethlius, the son of Jupiter. Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Paus. 5, c. 1.——II. A Grecian girl, who fell in love with a youth called Evathlus. As she was unable to gain the object of her love, she threw herself from a precipice. This tragical story was made into a song by Stesichorus, and was still extant in the age of Athenæus, 14.

Calydonius, a surname of Bacchus.

Calypso, one of the Oceanides, or one of the daughters of Atlas, according to some, was goddess of silence, and reigned in the island of Ogygia, whose situation and even existence is doubted. When Ulysses was shipwrecked on her coasts, she received him with great hospitality, and offered him immortality if he would remain with her as a husband. The hero refused, and after seven years' delay, he was permitted to depart from the island by order of Mercury, the messenger of Jupiter. During his stay, Ulysses had two sons by Calypso, Nausithous and Nausinous. Vid. Ogygia, Part I. Homer. Od. 7 and 15.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 360.—Ovid. de Pont. 4, ep. 18. Amor. 2, el. 17.—Propert. 1, el. 15.

Camilla, queen of the Volsci, was daughter of Metabus and Casmilla. She was educated in the woods, inured to the labours of hunting, and fed upon the milk of mares. Her father devoted her, when young, to the service of Diana. When she was declared queen, she marched at the head of an army, and, accompanied by three youthful females of equal courage as herself, to assist Turnus against Æneas, where she signalized herself by the numbers that perished by her hand. She was so swift that she could run, or rather fly, over a field of corn without bending the blades, and make her way over the sea without wetting her feet. She died by a wound she had received from Aruns. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 803, l. 11. v. 435.

Camiro and Clytia, two daughters of Pandarus of Crete. When their parents were dead, they were left to the care of Venus; who, with the other goddesses, brought them up with tenderness, and asked Jupiter to grant them kind husbands. Jupiter, to punish upon them the crime of their father, who was accessary to the impiety of Tantalus, ordered the harpies to carry them away and deliver them to the furies. Paus. 10, c. 30.—Homer. Od. 20. v. 66.

Camenæ, a name given to the muses, from the sweetness and melody of their songs, a canendo amæno, or, according to Varro, from carmen. Varro. de L. L. 5, c. 7.

Campe, kept the 100 handed monsters confined in Tartarus. Jupiter killed her, because she refused to give them their liberty to come to his assistance against the Titans. Hesiod. Theog. 500.—Apollod. 1, c. 2.

Canens, a nymph, called also Venilia, daughter of Janus and wife of Picus, king of the Laurentes. When Circe had changed her husband into a bird, she lamented him so much that she pined away, and was changed into a voice. She was reckoned as a deity by the inhabitants. Ovid. Met. 14, fab. 9.

Capaneus, a noble Argive, son of Hipponous and Astinome, and husband to Evadne. He was so impious, that when he went to the Theban war, he declared that he would take Thebes even in spite of Jupiter. Such contempt provoked the god, who struck him dead with a thunderbolt. His body was burnt separately from the others, and his wife threw herself on the burning pile to mingle her ashes with his. It is said that Æsculapius restored him to life. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 404.—Stat. Theb. 3, &c.—Hygin. fab. 68 and 70.—Euripid. in Phœniss. and Supp.—Æschil. Sept. ante Theb.

Capricornus, a sign of the zodiac, in which appear 28 stars in the form of a goat, supposed by the ancients to be the goat of Amalthæa, which fed Jupiter with her milk. Some maintain that it is Pan, who changed himself into a goat when frightened at the approach of Typhon. When the sun enters this sign it is the winter solstice, or the longest night in the year. Manil. 2 and 4.—Horat. 2, od. 17, v. 19.—Hygin. fab. 196. P. A. 2, c. 28.

Car, a son of Manes, who married Callirhoe, daughter of the Mæander. Caria received its name from him. Herodot. 1, c. 171.

Carmanor, a Cretan, who purified Apollo of slaughter. Paus. 2, c. 30.

Carme, a nymph, daughter of Eubulus and mother of Britomartis by Jupiter. She was one of Diana's attendants. Paus. 2, c. 30.

Carmelus, a god among the inhabitants of mount Carmel, situate between Syria and Judæa. His worship was peculiar in this, that neither temple nor image was erected to his divinity, which was yet held in the greatest respect. Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 78.—Sueton. Vesp. 5.

Carmenta, and Carmentis, a prophetess of Arcadia, mother of Evander, with whom she came to Italy, and was received by King Faunus, about 60 years before the Trojan war. Her name was Nicostrata, and she received that of Carmentis from the wildness of her looks when giving oracles, as if carens mentis. She was the oracle of the people of Italy during her life, and after death she received divine honours. She had a temple at Rome, and the Greeks offered her sacrifices under the name of Themis. Ovid Fast. 1, v. 467, l. 6. v. 530.—Plut. in Romul.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 339.—Liv. 5, c. 47.

Carna, and Cardinea, a goddess at Rome, who presided over hinges, as also over the entrails and secret parts of the human body. She was originally a nymph, called Grane, whom Janus ravished, and, for the injury, he gave her the power of presiding over the exterior of houses, and removing all noxious birds from the doors. The Romans offered her beans, bacon, and vegetables, to represent the simplicity of their ancestors. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 101, &c.

Carpo, a daughter of Zephyrus, and one of the Seasons. She was drowned in the Mæander. Paus. 9, c. 35.

Carpophora, a name of Ceres and Proserpine, in Tegea. Paus. 8, c. 53.

Cassiŏpe, and Cassiŏpea, I. married Cepheus, king of Æthiopia, by whom she had Andromeda. She boasted herself to be fairer than the Nereides; upon which Neptune, at the request of these nymphs, punished the insolence of Cassiope, and sent a huge sea monster to ravage Æthiopia. *Vid. Cassandra. Vid. Part II.

Castor and Pollox, were twin brothers, sons of Jupiter, by Leda, the wife of Tyndarus, king of Sparta. The manner of their birth is uncommon. Jupiter, who was enamoured of Leda, changed himself into a beautiful swan, and desired Venus to metamorphose herself into an eagle. After this transformation the goddess pursued the god with apparent ferocity, and Jupiter fled for refuge into the arms of Leda, who was bathing in the Eurotas, and nine months after brought forth two eggs, from one of which came Pollux and Helena; and from the other, Castor and Clytemnestra. The two former were the offspring of Jupiter, and the latter were believed to be the children of Tyndarus. Some suppose that Leda brought forth only one egg, from which Castor and Pollux sprung. Mercury, immediately after their birth, carried the two brothers to Pallena, where they were educated; and as soon as they had arrived to years of maturity they embarked with Jason to go in quest of the golden fleece. In this expedition both behaved with superior courage; Pollux conquered and slew Amycus in the combat of the cestus, and was ever after reckoned the god and patron of boxing and wrestling. Castor distinguished himself in the management of horses. The brothers cleared the Hellespont, and the neighbouring seas, from pirates, after their return from Colchis; from which circumstance they have been always deemed the friends of navigation. During the Argonautic expedition, in a violent storm, two flames of fire were seen to play round the heads of the sons of Leda, and immediately the tempest ceased and the sea was calmed. From this occurrence their power to protect sailors has been more firmly credited, and the two mentioned fires, which are very common in storms, have since been known by the name of Castor and Pollux; and when they both appeared, it was a sign of fair weather, but if only one was seen, it prognosticated storms, and the aid of Castor and Pollux was consequently solicited. Castor and Pollux made war against the Athenians to recover their sister Helen, whom Theseus had carried away; and from their clemency to the conquered they acquired the surname of Anaces, or benefactors. They were initiated in the sacred mysteries of the Cabiri, and in those of Ceres of Eleusis. They were invited to a feast when Lynceus and Idas were going to celebrate their marriage with Phœbe and Talaria, the daughters of Leucippus, who was brother to Tyndarus. Their behaviour after this invitation was cruel. They became enamoured of the two women whose nuptials they were to celebrate, and resolved to carry them away and marry them. This violent step provoked Lynceus and Idas; a battle ensued, and Castor killed Lynceus, and was killed by Idas. Pollux revenged the death of his brother by killing Idas; and as he was immortal, and tenderly attached to his brother, he intreated Jupiter to restore him to life, or to be deprived himself of immortality. Jupiter permitted Castor to share the immortality of his brother; and consequently, as long as the one was upon earth, so long was the other detained in the infernal regions, and they alternately lived and died every day; or, according to others, every six months. This act of fraternal love Jupiter rewarded by making the two brothers constellations in heaven, under the name of Gemini, which never appear together; but when one rises the other sets, and so on alternately. Castor made Talaria mother of Anogon, and Phœbe had Mnesileus by Pollux. They received divine honours after death, and were generally called Dioscuri, sons of Jupiter. White lambs were more particularly offered on their altars, and the ancients were fond of swearing by the divinity of the Dioscuri, by the expressions of Ædepol and Ædastor. Among the ancients, and especially among the Romans, there prevailed many public reports, at different times, that Castor and Pollux had made their appearance to their armies; and, mounted on white steeds, had marched at the head of their troops and furiously attacked the enemy. Their surnames were many, and they were generally represented mounted on two white horses, armed with spears, and riding side by side, with their heads covered with a bonnet, on whose top glittered a star. *Ovid. Centauri, a people of Thessaly, half men and half horses. This fable of the existence of the Centaurs, monsters supported upon the four legs of a horse, arises from the ancient people of Thessaly having tamed horses, and having appeared to the neighbours mounted on horseback, a sight very uncommon at that time, and which, when at a distance, seems only one body, and consequently one creature. Some derive the name απο του κεντειν ταυρους, goading bulls, because they went on horseback after their bulls which had strayed, or because they hunted wild bulls with horses. Some of the ancients have maintained, that monsters like the Centaurs can have existed in the natural course of things. Plutarch in Sympos, mentions one seen by Periander, tyrant of Corinth; and Pliny 7, c. 3, says, that he saw one embalmed in honey, which had been brought to Rome from Egypt in the reign of Claudius. The battle of the Centaurs with the Lapithæ is famous in history. Ovid has elegantly described it, and it has also employed the pen of Hesiod, Valerius Flaccus, &c., and Pausanias in Eliac, says, it was represented in the temple of Jupiter, at Olympia, and also at Athens, by Phidias and Parrhasius according to Pliny, 36, c. 5. The origin of this battle was a quarrel at the marriage of Hippodamia with Pirithous, where the Centaurs, intoxicated with wine, behaved with rudeness to the women that were present. Such an insult irritated Hercules, Theseus, and the rest of the Lapithæ, who defeated the Centaurs, and obliged them to leave their country and retire to Arcadia. Here their insolence was a second time punished by Hercules, who, when he was going to hunt the boar of Erymanthus, was kindly entertained by the Centaur Pholus, who gave him wine which belonged to the rest of the Centaurs, but had been given them on condition of their treating Hercules with it whenever he passed through their territory. They resented the liberty which Hercules took with their wine, and attacked him with fury. The hero defended himself with his arrows, and defeated his adversaries, who fled for safety to the Centaur Chiron. Chiron had been the preceptor of Hercules, and therefore they hoped that he would desist in his presence. Hercules, though awed at the sight of Chiron, did not desist, but, in the midst of the engagement, he wounded his preceptor in the knee, who, in the excessive pain he suffered, exchanged immortality for death. The death of Chiron irritated Hercules the more, and the Centaurs that were present were all extirpated by his hand. The most celebrated of the Centaurs were Chiron, Eurytus, Amycus, Gryneus, Caumas, Lycidas, Arneus, Medon, Rhœtus, Pisenor, Mermeros, Pholus, &c. Diod. 4.—Tzetzes Chil. 9.—Hist. 237.—*Hesiod. in Suet. Cephălus, I. son of Deioneus, king of Thessaly, by Diomede, daughter of Xuthus, married Procris, daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens. Aurora fell in love with him, and carried him away; but he refused to listen to her addresses, and was impatient to return to Procris. The goddess sent him back; and to try the fidelity of his wife, she made him put on a different form, and he arrived at the house of Procris in the habit of a merchant. Procris was deaf to every offer; but she suffered herself to be seduced by the gold of this stranger, who discovered himself the very moment that Procris had yielded up her virtue. This circumstance so ashamed Procris, that she fled from her husband, and devoted herself to hunting in the island of Eubœa, where she was admitted among the attendants of Diana, who presented her with a dog always sure of his prey, and a dart which never missed its aim and always returned to the hands of its mistress of its own accord. After this Procris returned in disguise to Cephalus, who was willing to disgrace himself by some unnatural concessions to obtain the dog and the dart of Procris. Procris discovered herself at the moment that Cephalus showed himself faithless, and a reconciliation was easily made between them. They loved one another with more tenderness than before, and Cephalus received from his wife the presents of Diana. As he was particularly fond of hunting, he every morning early repaired to the woods, and after much toil and fatigue, laid himself down in the cool shade, and earnestly called for Aura, or the refreshing breeze. This ambiguous word was mistaken for the name of a mistress; and some informer reported to the jealous Procris that Cephalus daily paid a visit to a mistress, whose name was Aura. Procris too readily believed the information, and secretly followed her husband into the woods. According to his daily custom, Cephalus retired to the shade, and called after Aura. At the name of Aura, Procris eagerly lifted up her head to see her expected rival. Her motion occasioned a rustling among the leaves of the bush that concealed her; and as Cephalus listened, he thought it to be a wild beast, and he let fly his unerring dart. Procris was struck to the heart, and instantly expired in the arms of her husband, confessing that ill-grounded jealousy was the cause of her death. According to Apollodorus there were two persons of the name of Cephalus; one, son of Mercury and Herse, carried away by Aurora, with whom he dwelt in Syria, and by whom he had a son called Tithonus. The other married Procris, and was the cause of the tragical event mentioned above. Cephalus was father of Arcesius by Procris, and of Phæton, according to Hesiod, by Aurora. Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 26.—Hygin. fab. 189.—Apollod. 3, c. 15.

Cēpheus, I. a king of Æthiopia, father of Andromeda, by Cassiope. He was one of the Argonauts, and was changed into a constellation after his death. *Ovid. The former he makes king of Tegea, and father of Sterope; and says, that he, with his twelve sons, assisted Hercules in a war against Hippocoon, where they were killed. The latter he calls king of Æthiopia, and father of Andromeda.—II. A son of Lycurgus, present at the chase of the Calydonian boar. Apollod. 1, c. 8.

Cephisiades, a patronymic of Eteocles, son of Andreus and Evippe, from the supposition of his being the son of the Cephisus. Paus. 9, c. 34.

Cerbĕrus, a dog of Pluto, the fruit of Echidna's union with Typhon. He had 50 heads; according to Hesiod, and three, according to other mythologists. He was stationed at the entrance of hell, as a watchful keeper, to prevent the living from entering the infernal regions, and the dead from escaping from their confinement. Orpheus lulled him to sleep with his lyre; and Hercules dragged him from hell when he went to redeem Alceste. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 134, l. 6, v. 417.—*Homer. Cercyon, and Cercyŏnes, a king of Eleusis, son of Neptune, or, according to others, of Vulcan. He obliged all strangers to wrestle with him; and as he was a dexterous wrestler, they were easily conquered and put to death. After many cruelties, he challenged Theseus in wrestling, and he was conquered and put to death by his antagonist. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 439.—Hygin. fab. 187.—Plut. in Thes.—Paus. 1, c. 5 and 39.

Ceres, the goddess of corn and of harvests, was daughter of Saturn and Vesta. She had a daughter by Jupiter, whom she called Pherephata, fruit-bearing, and afterwards Proserpine. This daughter was carried away by Pluto as she was gathering flowers in the plains near Enna. The rape of Proserpine was grievous to Ceres, who sought her all over Sicily; and when night came, she lighted two torches in the flames of Mount Ætna, to continue her search by night all over the world. She at last found her veil near the fountain Cyane; but no intelligence could be received of the place of her concealment, till at last the nymph Arethusa informed her that her daughter had been carried away by Pluto. During the inquiries of Ceres for her daughter, the cultivation of the earth was neglected, and the ground became barren; therefore, to repair the loss which mankind had suffered by her absence, the goddess went to Attica, which was become the most desolate country in the world, and instructed Triptolemus, of Eleusis, in every thing which concerned agriculture. She taught him how to plough the ground, to sow and reap the corn, to make bread, and to take particular care of fruit trees. After these instructions, she gave him her chariot, and commanded him to travel all over the world, and communicate his knowledge of agriculture to the rude inhabitants, who hitherto lived upon acorns and the roots of the earth. Vid. Triptolemus. Her beneficence to mankind made Ceres respected. Sicily was supposed to be the favourite retreat of the goddess; and Diodorus says, that she and her daughter made their first appearance to mankind in Sicily, which Pluto received as a nuptial dowry from Jupiter when he married Proserpine. The Sicilians made a yearly sacrifice to Ceres, every man according to his abilities; and the fountain of Cyane, through which Pluto opened himself a passage with his trident, when carrying away Proserpine, was publicly honoured with an offering of bulls, and the blood of the victims was shed in the waters of the fountain. Besides these, other ceremonies were observed in honour of the goddess who had so peculiarly favoured the island. The commemoration of the rape was celebrated about the beginning of the harvest, and the search of Ceres at the time that corn is sown in the earth. The latter festival continued six successive days. Attica, which had been so eminently distinguished by the goddess, gratefully remembered her favours in the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries. Vid. Eleusinia. Ceres also performed the duties of a legislator, and the Sicilians found the advantages of her salutary laws; hence her surname of Thesmophora. She is the same as the Isis of the Egyptians, and her worship, it is said, was first brought into Greece by Erechtheus. In their sacrifices the ancients offered Ceres a pregnant sow, as that animal often injures and destroys the productions of the earth. While the corn was yet in grass, they offered her a ram, after the victim had been led three times round the field. Ceres was represented with a garland of ears of corn on her head, holding in one hand a lighted torch, and in the other a poppy, which was sacred to her. She appears as a country-woman mounted on the back of an ox, and carrying a basket on her left arm, and holding a hoe; and sometimes she rides in a chariot drawn by winged dragons. She was supposed to be the same as Rhea, Tellus, Cybele, Bona Dea, Berecynthia, &c. The Romans paid her great adoration, and her festivals were yearly celebrated by the Roman matrons in the month of April, during eight days. They always bore lighted torches in commemoration of the goddess; and whoever came to these festivals without a previous initiation, was punished with death. Ceres is metaphorically called bread and corn, as the word Bacchus is frequently used to signify wine. Apollod. 1, c. 5, l. 2, c. 1, l. 3, c. 12 and 14.—Paus. 1, c. 31, l. 2, c. 34, l. 3, c. 23, l. 8, c. 25, &c.—Diod. 1, &c.—*Hesiod. Cēyx, a king of Trachinia, son of Lucifer and husband of Alcyone. He was drowned as he went to consult the oracle of Claros. His wife was apprized of his misfortune in a dream, and found his dead body washed on the seashore. They were both changed into birds called Alcyons. Vid. Alcyone. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 587.—Paus. 1, c. 32. According to Apollod. 1, c. 7, l. 2. c. 7, the husband of Alcyone and the king of Trachinia were two different persons.

Chales, a herald of Busiris, put to death by Hercules. Apollod. 2, c. 5.

Chalciŏpe, I. a daughter of Æetes, king of Colchis, who married Phryxus, son of Athamas, who had fled to her father's court for protection. She had some children by Phryxus, and she preserved her life from the avarice and cruelty of her father, who had murdered her husband to obtain the golden fleece. *Ovid. Chalcon, a Messenian, who reminded Antilochus, son of Nestor, to beware of the Æthiopians, by whom he was to perish.

Chaos, a rude and shapeless mass of matter, and confused assemblage of inactive elements, which, as the poets suppose, pre-existed the formation of the world, and from which the universe was formed by the hand and power of a superior being. This doctrine was first established by Hesiod, from whom the succeeding poets have copied it; and it is probable that it was obscurely drawn from the account of Moses, by being copied from the annals of Sanchoniathon, whose age is fixed antecedent to the siege of Troy. Chaos was deemed by some as one of the oldest of the gods, and invoked as one of the infernal deities. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 510.—Ovid. Met. 1, fab. 1.

Charites, and Gratiæ, the Graces, daughters of Venus by Jupiter or Bacchus, are three in number, Aglaia, Thalia, and Euphrosyne. They were the constant attendants of Venus, and they were represented as three young, beautiful, and modest virgins, all holding one another by the hand. They presided over kindness and all good offices, and their worship was the same as that of the nine muses. They were generally represented naked, because kindnesses ought to be done with sincerity and candour. The moderns explain the allegory of their holding their hands joined, by observing, that there ought to be a perpetual and never-ceasing intercourse of kindness and benevolence among friends. Their youth denotes the constant remembrance that we ought ever to have of kindnesses received; and their virgin purity and innocence teach us, that acts of benevolence ought to be done without any expectations of restoration, and that we ought never to suffer others or ourselves to be guilty of base or impure favours. Homer speaks only of two Graces.

Charon, a god of hell, son of Erebus and Nox, who conducted the souls of the dead in a boat over the river Styx and Acheron, to the infernal regions for an obolus. Such as had not been honoured with a funeral were not permitted to enter his boat without previously wandering on the shore for one hundred years. If any living person presented himself to cross the Stygian lake, he could not be admitted before he showed Charon a golden bough, which he had received from the Sibyl; and Charon was imprisoned for one year, because he had ferried over, against his own will, Hercules, without this passport. Charon is represented as an old robust man, with a hideous countenance, long white beard, and piercing eyes. His garment is ragged and filthy, and his forehead is covered with wrinkles. As all the dead were obliged to pay a small piece of money for their admission, it was always usual among the ancients to place under the tongue of the deceased a piece of money for Charon. This fable of Charon and his boat is borrowed from the Egyptians, whose dead were carried across a lake, where sentence was passed on them, and, according to their good or bad actions, they were honoured with a splendid burial, or left unnoticed in the open air. *Vid. Chelone, a nymph changed into a tortoise by Mercury, for not being present at the nuptials of Jupiter and Juno, and condemned to perpetual silence for having ridiculed these deities.

Chelonis, a daughter of Leonidas, king of Sparta, who married Cleombrotus. She accompanied her father, whom her husband had expelled, and soon after went into banishment with her husband, who had in his turn been expelled by Leonidas. Plut. in Agid. & Cleom.

Chimæra, I. a celebrated monster, sprung from Echidna and Typhon, which had three heads, that of a lion, of a goat, and a dragon, and continually vomited flames. The fore parts of its body were those of a lion, the middle was that of a goat, and the hinder parts were those of a dragon. It generally lived in Lycia, about the reign of Jobates, by whose orders Bellerophon, mounted on the horse Pegasus, overcame it. This fabulous tradition is explained by the recollection that there was a burning mountain in Lycia, called Chimæra, whose top was the resort of lions on account of its desolate wilderness; the middle, which was fruitful, was covered with goats; and at the bottom the marshy ground abounded with serpents. Bellerophon is said to have conquered the Chimæra, because he first made his habitation on that mountain. Plutarch says that it is the captain of some pirates, who adorned their ship with the images of a lion, a goat, and a dragon. From the union of the Chimæra with Orthos, sprung the Sphinx, and the lion of Nemæa. Homer. Il. 6, v. 181. —Hesiod. Theog. v. 322.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 2, c. 3.—Lucret. 5, v. 903.—Ovid. 9, Met. v. 646. —Virg. Æn. 6, v. 288.——II. One of the ships in the fleet of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 118.

Chione, I. a daughter of Dædalion, of whom Apollo and Mercury became enamoured. She became mother of Philammon and Autolycus, the former of whom, as being son of Apollo, became an excellent musician; and the latter was equally notorious for his robberies, of which his father Mercury was the patron. Chione grew so proud of her commerce with the gods, that she even preferred her beauty to that of Diana, for which impiety she was killed by the goddess and changed into a hawk. Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 8.——II. A daughter of Boreas and Orithyia, who had Eumolpus by Neptune. She threw her son into the sea, but he was preserved by his father. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 1. c. 38.

Chiron, a centaur, half man and half a horse, son of Philyra and Saturn, was famous for his knowledge of music, medicine, and shooting. He taught mankind the use of plants and medicinal herbs; and he instructed, in all the polite arts, the greatest heroes of his age; such as Achilles, Æsculapius, Hercules, Jason, Peleus, Æneas, &c. He was wounded in the knee by a poisoned arrow, by Hercules, in his pursuit of the centaurs. As the wound was incurable, and the cause of the most excruciating pains, Chiron begged Jupiter to deprive him of immortality. His prayers were heard, and he was placed by the gods among the constellations, under the name of Sagittarius. Hesiod. in Sculo.—Homer. Il. 11.—Paus. 3. c. 18, l. 5, c. 19, l. 9, c. 31.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 676.—Apollod. 2, c. 5, l. 3, c. 13.—Horat. epod. 13.

Chloe, a surname of Ceres at Athens. Her yearly festivals called Chloeia, were celebrated with much mirth and rejoicing, and a ram was always sacrificed to her. The name of Chloe is supposed to bear the same signification as Flava, so often applied to the goddess of corn. The name, from its signification, (χλοη, herba virens) has generally been applied to women possessed of beauty and simplicity.

Chloris, I. the goddess of flowers, who married Zephyrus. She is the same as Flora. Ovid. Fast. 5.—II. A daughter of Amphion, son of Jasus and Persephone, who married Neleus, king of Pylos, by whom she had one daughter and twelve sons, who all, except Nestor, were killed by Hercules. Homer. Od. 11, v. 280.—Paus. 2, c. 21, l. 9, c. 36.

Chonnidas, a man made preceptor to Theseus, by his grandfather Pittheus, king of Trœzene. The Athenians instituted sacrifices to him for the good precepts he had inculcated into his pupil. Plut. in Thes.

Chronus, the Greek name of Saturn, or Time, in whose honour festivals, called Chronia, were yearly celebrated by the Rhodians and some of the Greeks.

Chrysaor, a son of Medusa and Neptune. Some report that he sprung from the blood of Medusa, armed with a golden sword, whence his name χρυσος αορ. He married Callirhoe, one of the Oceanides, by whom he had Geryon, Echidna, and the Chimæra. Hesiod. Theog. v 295.

Chrysaoreus, a surname of Jupiter, from his temple at Stratonice, where all the Carians assembled upon any public emergency. Strab. 4.

Chryses. Vid. Part II.

Chrysippus, I. a natural son of Pelops, highly favoured by his father, for which Hippodamia, his step-mother, ordered her own sons, Atreus and Thyestes, to kill him, and to throw his body into a well, on account of which they were banished. Some say that Hippodamia's sons refused to murder Chrysippus, and that she did it herself. Hygin. fab. 85.—Plato. de Leg. 6.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Paus. 6, c. 20.

Chthonia, a surname of Ceres, from a temple built to her by Chthonia, at Hermione. She had a festival there called by the same name, and celebrated every summer. During the celebration, the priests of the goddess marched in procession, accompanied by the magistrates and a crowd of women and boys in white apparel, with garlands of flowers on their heads. Behind was dragged an untamed heifer, just taken from the herd. When they came to the temple, the victim was let loose, and four old women, armed with scythes, sacrificed the heifer. A second, a third, and a fourth victim, was in a like manner despatched by the old women; and it was observable that they all fell on the same side. Paus. 2, c. 35.

Cilix, a son of Phœnix, or, according to Herodotus, of Agenor, who, after seeking in vain his sister Europa, settled in a country to which he gave the name of Cilicia. Apollod. 3, c. 1. —Herodot. 7, c. 91.

Cinaradas, one of the descendants of Cinyras, who presided over the ceremonies of Venus at Paphos. Tacit. 2. Hist. c. 3.

Cinxia, a surname of Juno, who presided over marriages, and was supposed to untie the girdle of new brides.

Cinyras, a king of Cyprus, son of Paphus, who married Cenchreis, by whom he had a daughter called Myrrha. Cinyras, according to some, stabbed himself. He was so rich, that his opulence, like that of Crœsus, became proverbial. Ovid. Met. 10, fab. 9.—Plut. in Parall. —Hygin. fab. 242, 248, &c.

Circe, a daughter of Sol and Perseis, celebrated for her knowledge in magic and venomous herbs. She was sister to Æetes, king of Colchis, and Pasiphæ, the wife of Minos. She married a Sarmatian prince of Colchis, whom she murdered to obtain his kingdom. She was expelled by her subjects, and carried by her father upon the coasts of Italy, in an island called Ææa. Ulysses, at his return from the Trojan war, visited the place of her residence; and all his companions, who ran headlong into pleasure and voluptuousness, were changed by Circe's potions into filthy swine. Ulysses, who was fortified against all enchantments by an herb called moly, which he had received from Mercury, went to Circe, and demanded, sword in hand, the restoration of his companions to their former state. She complied, and loaded the hero with pleasures and honours. In this voluptuous retreat, Ulysses had by Circe one son called Telegonus, or two, according to Hesiod, called Agrius and Latinus. For one whole year Ulysses forgot his glory in Circe's arms, and at his departure, the nymph advised him to descend into hell, and consult the manes of Tiresias concerning the fates that attended him. Circe showed herself cruel to Scylla her rival, and to Picus. Vid. Scylla and Picus. Ovid. Met. 14, fab. 1 and 5.—Horat. 1, ep. 2, l. 1, od. 17.—Virg. Ecl. 8, v. 70.—Æn. 3, v. 386, l. 7, v. 10, &c.—Hygin. fab. 125.—Apollon. 4. Arg.—Homer. Od. 10, v. 136, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Hesiod. Th. 956.—Strab. 5.

ClavigER, a surname of Janus, from his being represented with a key. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 228. Hercules received also that surname, as he was armed with a club. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 284.

Cleodoxa, a daughter of Niobe and Amphion, changed into a stone as a punishment for her mother's pride. Apollod. 3, c. 5.

Clio, I. the first of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over history. She is represented crowned with laurels, holding in one hand a trumpet, and a book in the other. Sometimes she holds a plectrum or quill with a lute. Her name signifies honour and reputation, (κλεος, gloria;) and it was her office faithfully to record the actions of brave and illustrious heroes. She had Hyacintha by Pierus, son of Magnes. She was also mother of Hymenæus, and Ialemus, according to others. Hesiod. Theog. v. 75.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Strab. 14.——II. One of Cyrene's nymphs. Virg. G. 4, v. 341.

Clytie, the wife of Cyzicus, who hung herself when she saw her husband dead. Apollon. 1.—Orpheus.

Cloacina, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the Cloacæ. Some suppose her to be Venus, whose statue was found in the Cloacæ, whence the name. The Cloacæ were large receptacles for the filth and dung of the whole city, begun by Tarquin the Elder, and finished by Tarquin the Proud. They were built all under the city; so that, according to an expression of Pliny, Rome seemed to be suspended between heaven and earth. The building was so strong, and the stones so large, that though they were continually washed by impetuous torrents, they remained unhurt during above 700 years. There were public officers chosen to take care of the Cloacæ, called Curatores Cloacarum urbis. Liv. 3, c. 48.—Plin. 5, c. 29.

Clotho, the youngest of the three Parcæ, daughter of Jupiter and Themis, or, according to Hesiod, of Night, was supposed to preside over the moment that we are born. She held the distaff in her hand, and span the thread of life, whence her name, (κλωθειν, to spin.) She was represented wearing a crown with seven stars, and covered with a variegated robe. Vid. Parcæ. Hesiod. Theog. v. 218.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.

Cluacina, a name of Venus, whose statue was erected in that place where peace was made between the Romans and Sabines, after the rape of the virgins. Vid. Cloacina.

Clusius, the surname of Janus when his temple was shut. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 130.

Clymene, I. a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, who married Japetus, by whom she had Atlas, Prometheus, Menœtius, and Epimetheus. Hesiod. Theog.——II. The mother of Phæton by Apollo. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 756.——III. The mother of Homer. Id. 10, c. 24.——IV. A female servant of Helen, who accompanied her mistress to Troy, when she eloped with Paris. Ovid. Heroid. 17, v. 267.—Homer. Il. 3, v. 144.

Clymenides, a patronymic given to Phæton's sisters, who were daughters of Clymene.

Clytemnestra, a daughter of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, by Leda. Vid. Part II.

Clytia, or Clytie, I. a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, beloved by Apollo. She was deserted by her lover, and pined away, and was changed into a flower, commonly called a sunflower, which still turns its head towards the sun in his course, as in pledge of her love. Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 3, &c.——II. A daughter of Amphidamus, mother of Pelops, by Tantalus.——III. A concubine of Amyntor, son of Phrastor, whose calumny caused Amyntor to put out the eyes of his falsely-accused son Phœnix.——IV. A daughter of Pandarus.

Cocalus, a king of Sicily, who hospitably received Dædalus when he fled before Minos. When Minos arrived in Sicily the daughters of Cocalus destroyed him. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 261.—Diod. 4.

Cœlus, or Uranus, an ancient deity, supposed to be the father of Saturn, Oceanus, Hyperion, &c. He was son of Terra, whom he afterwards married. The number of his children, according to some, amounted to forty-five. They were called Titans, and were so closely confined by their father, that they conspired against him, and were supported by their mother, who provided them with a scythe. Saturn armed himself with this scythe, and deprived his father of the organs of generation, as he was going to unite himself to Terra. From the blood which issued from the wound sprang the giants, furies, and nymphs. The mutilated parts were thrown into the sea, and from them, and the foam which they occasioned, arose Venus, the goddess of beauty. Hesiod. &c.

Comætho, a daughter of Pterilaus, who deprived her father of a golden hair in his head, upon which depended his fate. She was put to death by Amphitryon for her perfidy. Apol. 2, c. 4.

Comus, the god of revelry, feasting, and nocturnal entertainments. During his festivals men and women exchanged each other's dress. He was represented as a young and drunken man, with a garland of flowers on his head, and a torch in his hand, which seemed falling. He is more generally seen sleeping upon his legs, and turning himself when the heat of the falling torch scorched his side. Phil. 2. Icon.—Plut. Quæst. Rom.

Concordia, the goddess of peace and concord at Rome, to whom Camillus first raised a temple in the capitol, where the magistrates often assembled for the transaction of public business. She had, besides this, other temples and statues, and was addressed to promote the peace and union of families and citizens. Plut. in Camil.—Plin. 33, c. 1.—Cic. pro Domo.—Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 639, l. 6, v. 637.

Conisaltus, a god worshipped at Athens, with the same ceremonies as Priapus at Lampsacus. Strab. 3.

Connidas. Vid Chonnidas.

Consentes, the name which the Romans gave to the twelve superior gods, the Dii majorum gentium. The word signifies as much as consentientes, that is, who consented to the deliberations of Jupiter's council. They were twelve in number, whose names Ennius has briefly expressed in these lines:—

Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercurius, Jovi, Neptunus, Vulcanus, Apollo.
Varro, de R. R.

Consus, a deity at Rome, who presided over councils. His temple was covered in the Maximus Circus, to show that councils ought to be secret and inviolable. Some suppose that it is the same as Neptunus Equestris. Romulus instituted festivals to his honour, called Consualia, during the celebration of which the Romans carried away the Sabine women. Vid. Consuales Ludi, Part II. Plut. in Rom.—Auson. 69, and eleg. de fer. R. 19.—Dionys. Hal. 1.—Liv. 1, c. 9.

Coon, the eldest son of Antenor, killed by Agamemnon. Homer. Il.

Copia, the goddess of plenty; among the Romans, represented as bearing a horn filled with grapes, fruit, &c.

Copreus, a son of Pelops, who fled to Mycenæ at the death of Iphitus. Apollod. 2, c. 5.

Core, a daughter of Ceres, the same as Proserpine. Festivals, called Coreia, were instituted to her honour in Greece.

Corœsus, a priest of Bacchus, at Calydon in Bœotia, who was deeply enamoured of the nymph Callirhoe, who treated him with disdain. He complained to Bacchus, who visited the country with a pestilence. The Calydonians were directed by the oracle to appease the god by sacrificing Callirhoe on his altar. The nymph was led to the altar, and Coresus, who was to sacrifice her, forgot his resentment and stabbed himself. Callirhoe, conscious of her ingratitude to the love of Coresus, killed herself on the brink of a fountain, which afterwards bore her name. Paus. 7, c. 21.

Coria, a surname of Minerva among the Arcadians. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.

Corœbus, a hero of Argolis, who killed a serpent called Pœne, sent by Apollo to avenge Argos, and placed by some authors in the number of the furies. His country was afflicted with the plague, and he consulted the oracle of Delphi, which commanded him to build a temple, where a tripod, which was given him, should fall from his hands. Paus. 1, v. 43. Vid. Part II.

Coronis, I. a daughter of Phlegyas, loved by Apollo. She became pregnant by her lover, who killed her on account of her criminal partiality to Ischys the Thessalian. The child was preserved and called Æsculapius; and the mother, after death, received divine honours, and had a statue at Sicyon, in her son's temple, which was never exposed to public view. Paus. 2, c. 26.——II. The daughter of Coronæus, king of Phocis, changed into a crow by Minerva, when flying before Neptune. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 543.——III. One of the daughters of Atlas and Pleione.

Corœnus, I. a son of Apollo. Paus. 2, c. 5. ——II. A son of Phoroneus, king of the Lapithæ. Diod. 4.

Corybantes, the priests of Cybele, called also Galli. In the celebration of their festivals they beat their cymbals, and behaved as if delirious. They first inhabited on mount Ida, and from thence passed into Crete, and secretly brought up Jupiter. Some suppose that they received their name from Corobas, son of Jasus and Cybele, who first introduced the rites of his mother into Phrygia. There was a festival at Cnossus, in Crete, called Corybantica, in commemoration of the Corybantes, who there educated Jupiter. Vid. Curetes. Paus. 8, c. 37.—Diod. 5.—Horat. 1, od. 16.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 617, l. 10, v. 250.

Corycides, the nymphs who inhabited the foot of Parnassus. The name is often applied to the muses. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 320.

Corymbifer, a surname of Bacchus, from his wearing a crown of corymbi, certain berries that grow on the ivy. Ovid. 1. Fast. v. 393.

Corytus, a king of Etruria, father to Jasius, whom Dardanus is said to have put to death to obtain the kingdom.

Cottus, a giant, son of Cœlus and Terra, who had 100 hands and 50 heads. Hesiod. Theog. v. 147.

Cotyleus, a surname of Æsculapius, worshipped on the borders of the Eurotas. His temple was raised by Hercules. Paus. 3, c. 19.

Cotytto, the goddess of all debauchery, whose festivals, called Cotyttia, was celebrated by the Athenians, Corinthians, Thracians, &c., during the night. Her priests were called Baptæ. A festival of the same name was observed in Sicily, where the votaries of the goddess carried about boughs hung with cakes and fruit, which it was lawful for any person to pluck off. It was a capital punishment to reveal whatever was seen or done at these sacred festivals, and it cost Eupolis his life for an unseasonable reflection upon them. The goddess Cotytto is supposed to be the same as Proserpine or Ceres. Horat. epod. 17, v. 58.—Juv. 2, v. 91.

Creon, I. a king of Corinth, was son of Sisyphus. He promised his daughter Glauce to Jason, who repudiated Media. To revenge the success of her rival, Medea sent her for a present a gown covered with poison. Glauce put it on, and was seized with sudden pains. Her body took fire, and she expired in the greatest torments. The house also was consumed by the fire, and Creon and his family shared Glauce's fate. Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 7. —Eurip. in Med.—Hygin. fab. 25.—Diod. 4. ——II. A son of Menœtius, brother to Jocasta, the wife and mother of Œdipus. At the death of Laius, who had married Jocasta, Creon ascended the vacant throne of Thebes. Vid. Eteocles. Creon was afterwards killed by Theseus, who had made war against him at the request of Adrastus, because he refused burial to the Argives. Vid. Eteocles, Polynices, Adrastus, Œdipus. Apollod. 3, c. 56, &c.—Paus. 1, c. 39, l. 9, c. 5, &c.—Stat. in Theb.—Sophocl. in Antig.—Diod. 1 and 4.

Creontiades, a son of Hercules by Megara, daughter of Creon, killed by his father because he had slain Lycus.

Cretheis, the wife of Acastus, king of Iolchos, who fell in love with Peleus, son of Æacus. She is called by some Hippolyte, or Astidamia. Pindar. Nem. 4.

Cretheus, a son of Æolus, father of Æon, by Tyro, his brother's daughter. Apol. 1, c. 7, &c.

Creüsa, a daughter of Creon, king of Corinth. As she was going to marry Jason, who had divorced Medea, she put on a poisoned garment, which immediately set her body on fire, and she expired in the most excruciating torments. She had received this gown as a gift from Medea, who wished to take that revenge upon the infidelity of Jason. Some call her Glauce. Vid. Part II. Ovid. de Art. Am. 1, v. 335.

Crimissus, was a Trojan prince, who exposed his daughter on the sea, rather than suffer her to be devoured by the sea-monster which Neptune sent to punish the infidelity of Laomedon. Vid. Laomedon. The daughter came safe to the shores of Sicily. Crimissus, some time after, went in search of his daughter, and was so disconsolate for her loss, that the gods changed him into a river in Sicily, and granted him the power of metamorphosing himself into whatever shape he pleased. Vid. Part I.

Crocus, a beautiful youth, enamoured of the nymph Smilax. He was changed into a flower of the same name, on account of the impatience of his love, and Smilax was metamorphosed into a yew-tree. Ovid. 4, Met. v. 283.

Crotopus, a king of Argos, son of Agenor, and father to Psamathe, the mother of Linus by Apollo. Ovid. in Ib. 480.

Crotus, a son of Eumene, the nurse of the Muses. He devoted his life to the labours of the chase, and after death Jupiter placed him among the constellations, under the name of Sagittarius. Paus. 9, c. 29.

Cupido, a celebrated deity among the ancients, god of love, and love itself. There are different traditions concerning his parents. Cicero mentions three Cupids; one, son of Mercury and Diana; another, son of Mercury and Venus; and the third, of Mars and Venus. Plato mentions two; Hesiod, the most ancient theogonist, speaks only of one, who, as he says, was produced at the same time as Chaos and the Earth. There are, according to the more received opinions, two Cupids, one of whom is a lively ingenious youth, son of Jupiter and Venus; whilst the other, son of Nox and Erebus, is distinguished by debauchery and riotous disposition. Cupid is represented as a winged infant, naked, armed with a bow and quiver full of arrows. On gems, and all other pieces of antiquity, he is represented as amusing himself with some childish diversion. Sometimes he appears driving a hoop, throwing a quoit, playing with a nymph, catching a butterfly, or trying to burn with a torch; sometimes, like a conqueror, he marched triumphantly with a helmet on his head, a spear on his shoulder, and a buckler on his arm. His power was generally known by his riding on the back of a lion, or on a dolphin, or breaking to pieces the thunderbolts of Jupiter. Among the ancients he was worshipped with the same solemnity as his mother Venus; and as his influence was extended over the heavens, the sea, and the earth, and even the empire of the dead, his divinity was universally acknowledged, and vows, prayers, and sacrifices were daily offered to him. According to some accounts, the union of Cupid with Chaos gave birth to men; and all the animals which inhabit the earth, and even the gods themselves, were the offspring of love before the foundation of the world. Cic. de Nat. D. 3.—Ovid. Met. 1, fab. 10.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 121, &c.—Oppian. Hali. 4. Cyneg. 2.—Bion. Idyll. 3.—Moschus.—Eurip. in Hippol.—Theocrit. Idyll. 3, 11, &c.

Curētes, by some considered the same as the Cabiri, Corybantes, &c. Vid. Cabiri. Strabo informs us, that the Curetes and Corybantes, whether gods, genii, demigods, or the servants of the gods, were the attendants of Rhea or Cybele; as the Fauns, Bacchantes, and other rural deities, formed the escort of Bacchus. Some writers are of opinion that, besides the Curetes above described, there were others in Phrygia, who were only servants in the worship of Cybele; and who, on solemn occasions imitated the ceremonies of the Corybantes, thus commemorating their actions. The most important achievement of the Corybantes was that of having rescued the infant Jove from Saturn, by drowning his cries with a noise produced by beating their shields with their swords. Hence originated the Pyrrhic dance, in which the later Curetes honoured the goddess, not only by striking their shields, but by moving with measured steps, and swaying the head to and fro. The effect was heightened by the drawing of the crests upon their helmets. Lucretius, in describing the dance, distinguishes between the ancient and later Curetes. Their number is variously reported. Those who identify them with the Dioscuri, make them two in number; others three, five, eleven; and some extend their number to fifty-two. Faber's Cabiri. Millin.

Cyăne, a nymph of Sicily, who endeavoured to assist Proserpine when she was carried away by Pluto. The god changed her into a fountain now called Pisme, a few miles from Syracuse. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 112

Cybēbe, a name of Cybele.

Cybēle, a goddess, daughter of Cœlus and Terra, and wife of Saturn. She is supposed to be the same as Ceres, Rhea, Ops, Vesta, Bona Mater, Magna Mater, Berecynthia, Dindymene, &c. According to Diodorus she was the daughter of a Lydian prince called Menos, by his wife Dindymene; and he adds, that as soon as she was born she was exposed on a mountain. She was preserved and suckled by some of the wild beasts of the forest, and received the name of Cybele from the mountain where her life had been preserved. The attachment of Cybele to Atys is often dwelt upon by the poets of antiquity. In Phrygia, her festivals were observed with the greatest solemnity. Her priests, called Corybantes, Galli, &c., were obliged to qualify themselves for her service after the manner of Atys. In the celebration of the festivals they imitated the manners of madmen, and filled the air with dreadful shrieks and howlings, mixed with the confused noise of drums, tabrets, bucklers, and spears. This was in commemoration of the sorrow of Cybele for the loss of her favourite Atys. Those who consider Atys as typical of the sun, see, in the rites of Cybele and her attachment to Atys, a representation of the relation which existed between the Sun and Earth. Faber refers the fable of Cybele and Atys to the Helio-Arkite worship; so that, according to him, Rhea or Cybele is a new personification of the lunar Ark; hence the mysteries of Rhea were immediately connected with those of Bacchus or Noah; and hence, too, the alternate lamentations and rejoicing at the rites of Cybele, on account of the supposed death and revival of Bacchus or Adonis, who by the Phrygians was styled Atys, and by the Egyptians Osiris. Cybele was generally represented as a robust woman, far advanced in her pregnancy, to intimate the fecundity of the earth. She held keys in her hand, and her head was crowned with rising turrets, and sometimes with the leaves of an oak. She sometimes appears riding in a chariot drawn by two tame lions; Atys follows by her side, carrying a ball in his hand, and supporting himself upon a fir-tree, which is sacred to the goddess. Sometimes Cybele is represented with a sceptre in her hand, with her head covered with a tower. From Phrygia the worship of Cybele passed into Greece, and was solemnly established at Eleusis, under the name of the Eleusinian mysteries of Ceres. The Romans, by order of the Sibylline books, brought the statue of the goddess from Pessinus into Italy; and when the ship which carried it had run on a shallow bank of the Tiber, the virtue and innocence of Claudia were vindicated in removing it with her girdle. It is supposed that the mysteries of Cybele were first known about 1580 years B. C. The Romans were particularly superstitious in washing every year, on the 6th of the calends of April, the shrine of this goddess in the waters of the river Almon. Vid. Trist. 4, v. 210 and 361.—Plut. de Loquac.—Cic. ad Attic.—Cæl. Rhod. 8, c. 17, &c.

Cychreus, a son of Neptune and Salamis. After death he was honoured as a god in Salamis and Attica. Paus. 1, c. 35.—Plut. in Thes.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.

Cyclōpes, a certain race of men of gigantic stature, supposed to be the sons of Cœlus and Terra. They had but one eye in the middle of the forehead; whence their name (κυκλος, circules, ωψ oculus.) They were three in number, according to Hesiod, called Arges, Brontes, and Steropes. Their number was greater according to other mythologists, and, in the age of Ulysses, Polyphemus was their king. Vid. Polyphemus. They inhabited the western part of the island of Sicily; and because they were uncivilized in their manners, the poets speak of them as men-eaters. The tradition of their having only one eye originates from their custom of wearing small bucklers of steel, which covered their faces, and had a small aperture in the middle, which corresponded exactly to the eye. From their vicinity to Mount Ætna, they have been supposed to be the workmen of Vulcan, and to have fabricated the thunderbolts of Jupiter. The most solid walls and impregnable fortresses were said, among the ancients, to be the work of the Cyclops, to render them more respectable; and we find that Jupiter was armed with what they had fabricated, and that the shield of Pluto, and the trident of Neptune, were the produce of their labour. The Cyclops were reckoned among the gods, and we find a temple dedicated to their service at Corinth, where sacrifices were solemnly offered. Apollo destroyed them all, because they had made the thunderbolts of Jupiter with which his son Æsculapius had been killed. From the different accounts given of the Cyclops by the ancients, it may be concluded that they were all the same people, to whom various functions have been attributed, which cannot be reconciled one to the other without drawing the pencil of fiction or mythology. Apollod. 1, c. 1 and 2.—*Homer. Cyllĕnĕĭus, a surname of Mercury, from his being born on the mountain Cyllene.

Cymŏthoe, one of the Nereides, represented by Virg. Æn. 1, v. 148, as assisting the Trojans with Triton, after the storm with which Æolus, at the request of Juno, had afflicted the fleet.

Cynosūra, a nymph of Ida in Crete. She nursed Jupiter who changed her into a star which bears the same name. It is the same as the Ursa Minor. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 107.

Cynthia, a surname of Diana, from mount Cynthus, where she was born.

Cynthius, a surname of Apollo, from mount Cynthus.

Cyparissus, a youth, son of Telephus of Cea, beloved by Apollo. He killed a favourite stag of Apollo, for which he was so sorry that he pined away and was changed by the god into a cypress tree. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 680.—Ovid. Met 10, v. 121.

Cyrĕne, the daughter of the river Peneus, of whom Apollo became enamoured. He carried her to that part of Africa which is called Cyrenaica, where she brought forth Aristæus. She is called by some daughter of Hypseus, king of the Lapithæ, and son of the Peneus. Virg. G. 4, v. 321.—Justin. 13, c. 7.—Pindar. Pyth. 9. Vid. Part I.

Dactŷli, a name given to the priests of Cybele, which some derives from δακτυλος, finger, because they were ten, the same number as the fingers of the hand. Paus. 1, c. 8.

Dædălion, a son of Lucifer, brother to Ceyx and father of Philonis. He was so afflicted at the death of Philonis, whom Diana had put to death, that he threw himself down from the top of mount Parnassus, and was changed into a falcon by Apollo. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 295.

Dædălus, an Athenian, son of Eupalamus, descended from Erechtheus, king of Athens. He was the most ingenious artist of his age, and to him we are indebted for the invention of the wedge, the axe, the wimble, the level, and many other mechanical instruments, and the sails of ships. He made statues which moved of themselves, and seemed to be endowed with life. Talus, his sister's son, promised to be as great as himself, by the ingenuity of his inventions; and therefore, from envy, he threw him down from a window and killed him. After the murder of this youth, Dædalus, with his son Icarus, fled from Athens to Crete, where Minos, king of the country, gave him a cordial reception. Dædalus made a famous labyrinth for Minos, and assisted Pasiphae, the queen, to gratify her unnatural passion for a bull. For this action Dædalus incurred the displeasure of Minos, who ordered him to be confined in the labyrinth which he had constructed. Here he made himself wings with feathers and wax, and carefully fitted them to his body, and to that of his son, who was the companion of his confinement. They took their flight in the air from Crete; but the heat of the sun melted the wax on the wings of Icarus, whose flight was too high, and he fell into that part of the ocean which from him has been called the Icarian Sea. The father, by a proper management of his wings, alighted at Cumæ, where he built a temple to Apollo, and thence directed his course to Sicily, where he was kindly received by Cocalus, who reigned over part of the country. He left many monuments of his ingenuity in Sicily, which still existed in the age of Diodorus Siculus. He was despatched by Cocalus, who was afraid of the power of Minos, who had declared war against him because he had given an asylum to Dædalus. The flight of Dædalus from Crete, with wings, is explained by observing that he was the inventor of sails, which in his age might pass at a distance for wings. Paus. 1, 7 and 9.—Diod. 4.—*Ovid. Damia, a surname of Cybele.

Danïcr, the name of the piece of money which Charon required to convey the dead over the Styx. Suidas.

Dănae, 1. the daughter of Acrisius, king of Argos, by Eurydice. She was confined in a brazen tower by her father, who had been told by an oracle that his daughter's son would put him to death. His endeavours to prevent Danae from becoming a mother proved fruitless; and Jupiter, who was enamoured of her, introduced himself to her bed by changing himself into a golden shower. From his embraces Danae had a son, with whom she was exposed on the sea by her father. The wind drove the bark which carried her to the coasts of the island of Seriphus, where she was saved by some fishermen, and carried to Polydectes, king of the place, whose brother, called Dictys, educated the child, called Perseus, and tenderly treated the mother. Polydectes fell in love with her; but as he was afraid of her son, he sent him to conquer the Gorgons, pretending that he wished Medusa's head to adorn the nuptials which he was going to celebrate with Hippodamia, the daughter of Œnomaus. When Perseus had victoriously finished his expedition, he retired to Argos with Danae, to the house of Acrisius, whom he inadvertently killed. Some suppose that it was Prœtus, the brother of Acrisius, who introduced himself to Danae in the brazen tower; and instead of a golden shower, it was maintained that the keepers of Danae were bribed by the gold of her seducer. Virgil mentions that Danae came to Italy with some fugitives of Argos, and that she founded a city called Ardea. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 611. *Art. A daughter of Danaus, to whom Neptune offered violence.

Dănaïdes, the fifty daughters of Danaus king of Argos. When their uncle Ægyptus came from Egypt with his fifty sons, they were promised in marriage to their cousins; but before the celebration of their nuptials, Danaus, who had been informed by an oracle that he was to be killed by the hands of one of his sons-in-law, made his daughters solemnly promise that they would destroy their husbands. They were provided with daggers by their father, and all, except Hypermnestra, stained their hands with the blood of their cousins the first night of their nuptials; and as a pledge of their obedience to their father's injunctions, they presented him each with the head of the murdered sons of Ægyptus. Hypermnestra was summoned to appear before her father, and answer for her disobedience in suffering her husband, Lynceus, to escape; but the unanimous voice of the people declared her innocent, and in consequence of her honourable acquittal, she dedicated a temple to the goddess of Persuasion. The sisters were purified of this murder by Mercury and Minerva, by order of Jupiter: but according to the more received opinion, they were condemned to severe punishment in hell, and were compelled to fill with water a vessel full of holes, so that the water ran out as soon as poured into it, and therefore their labour was infinite and their punishment eternal. The heads of the sons of Ægyptus were buried at Argos; but their bodies were left at Lerna, where the murder had been committed. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Horat. 3, od. 11.—Strab. 8.—Paus. 2, c. 16.—Hygin. fab. 168, &c.

Danaus, a son of Belus and Anchinoe, who, after his father's death, reigned conjointly with his brother Ægyptus on the throne of Egypt. Some time after, a difference arose between the brothers, and Danaus set sail with his fifty daughters in quest of a settlement. He visited Rhodes, where he consecrated a statue to Minerva, and arrived safe on the coast of Peloponnesus, where he was hospitably received by Gelanor, king of Argos. Gelanor had lately ascended the throne, and the first years of his reign were marked with dissensions with his subjects. Danaus took advantage of Gelanor's unpopularity, and obliged him to abdicate the crown. In Gelanor, the race of the Inachide was extinguished, and in Danaus the Belides began to reign at Argos. Some authors say that Gelanor voluntarily resigned the crown to Danaus, on account of the wrath of Neptune who had dried up all the waters of Argolis to punish the impiety of Inachus. The success of Danaus invited the fifty sons of Ægyptus to embark for Greece. They were kindly received by their uncle, who, either apprehensive of their number, or terrified by an oracle which threatened his ruin by one of his sons-in-law, caused his daughters, to whom they were promised in marriage, to murder them the first night of their nuptials. His fatal orders were executed, but Hypermnestra alone spared the life of Lynceus. Vid. Danaides. Danaus at first persecuted Lynceus with unremitted fury, but he was afterwards reconciled to him, and he acknowledged him for his son-in-law and successor, after a reign of 50 years. He died about 1425 years before the Christian era, and after death he was honoured with a splendid monument in the town of Argos, which still existed in the age of Pausanias. According to Æschylus, Danaus left Egypt not to be present at the marriage of his daughters with the sons of his brother, a connexion which he deemed unlawful and impious. The ship in which Danaus came to Greece was called Armais, and was the first that had ever appeared there. It is said that the use of pumps was first introduced into Greece by Danaus. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Paus. 2, c, 19.—Hygin. fab. 168, &c.—Herodot. 2, c. 91, &c. 7, c. 94.

Daphne, I. a daughter of the river Peneus, or of the Ladon, by the goddess Terra, of whom Apollo became enamoured. This passion had been raised by Cupid, with whom Apollo, proud of his late conquest over the serpent Python, had disputed the power of his darts. Daphne heard with horror the addresses of the god, and endeavoured to remove herself from his importunities by flight. Apollo pursued her; and Daphne, fearful of being caught, entreated the assistance of the gods, who changed her into a laurel. Apollo crowned his head with the leaves of the laurel, and for ever ordered that that tree should be sacred to his divinity. Some say that Daphne was admired by Leucippus, son of Œnomaus, king of Pisa, who, to be in her company, disguised his sex, and attended her in the woods in the habit of a huntress. Leucippus gained Daphne's esteem and love; but Apollo, who was his powerful rival, discovered his sex, and Leucippus was killed by the companions of Diana. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 452, &c.—Parthen. Erotic. c. 15.—Paus. 8, c. 20.——II. A daughter of Tiresias, priestess in the temple of Delphi, supposed by some to be the same as Manto. She was consecrated to the service of Apollo by the Epigoni, or, according to others, by the goddess Tellus. She was called Sibyl, on account of the wildness of her looks and expressions when she delivered oracles. Her oracles were generally in verse, and Homer, according to some accounts, has introduced much of her poetry in his compositions. Diod. 4.—Paus. 10, c. 5.

Daphnis, a shepherd of Sicily, son of Mercury by a Sicilian nymph. He was educated by the nymphs. Pan taught him to sing and play upon the pipe, and the muses inspired him with the love of poetry. It is supposed he was the first who wrote pastoral poetry, in which his successor Theocritus so happily excelled. He was extremely fond of hunting; and at his death, five of his dogs, from their attachment to him, refused all aliments and pined away. From the celebrity of this shepherd, the name of Daphnis has been appropriated by the poets, ancient and modern, to express a person fond of rural employments, and of the peaceful innocence which accompanies the tending of flocks. Ælian. V. H. 10, c. 18.—Diod. 4.

Dardanus, a son of Jupiter and Electra, who killed his brother Jasius to obtain the kingdom of Etruria after the death of his reputed father Corytus, and fled to Samothrace, and thence to Asia Minor, where he married Batia, the daughter of Teucer, king of Teucria. After the death of his father-in-law he ascended the throne, and reigned 62 years. He built the city of Dardania, and was reckoned the founder of the kingdom of Troy. He was succeeded by Erichthonius. According to some, Corybas, his nephew, accompanied him to Teucria, where he introduced the worship of Cybele. Dardanus taught his subjects to worship Minerva; and he gave them two statues of the goddess, one of which is well known by the name of Palladium. *Virg. Daulis, a nymph from whom the city of Daulis in Phocis, anciently called Anaeris, received its name. It was there that Philomela and Procne made Tereus eat the flesh of his son; and hence the nightingale, into which Philomela was changed, is often called Daulias avis. Ovid. ep. 15, v. 154.—Strab. 9.—Paus. 10, c. 4.—Ptol. 3, c. 15.—Liv. 32, c. 18.—Plin. 4, c. 3.

Daunus, a son of Pilumnus and Danae. He came from Illyricum into Apulia, where he reigned over part of the country, which from him was called Daunia, and he was still on the throne when Diomedes came to Italy. Ptol. 3, c. 1.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Strab. 5.

Deiēlus, a man who informed Castor and Pollux that their sister, whom Theseus had carried away, was concealed at Aphidnæ. Herodot. 9, c. 73.

Dejanira, a daughter of Œneus, king of Ætolia. Her beauty procured her many admirers, and her father promised to give her in marriage to him only who proved to be the strongest of his competitors. Hercules obtained the prize, and married Dejanira, by whom he had three children, the most known of whom is Hyllus. As Dejanira was once travelling with her husband, they were stopped by the swollen streams of the Evenus, and the centaur Nessus, offered Hercules to convey her safe to the opposite shore. The hero consented; but no sooner had Nessus gained the bank, than he attempted to offer violence to Dejanira, and to carry her away in the sight of her husband. Hercules, upon this, aimed, from the other shore, a poisoned arrow at the seducer, and mortally wounded him. Nessus, as he expired, wished to avenge his death upon his murderer; and he gave Dejanira his tunic, which was covered with blood, poisoned and infected by the arrow, observing, that it had the power of reclaiming a husband from unlawful loves. Dejanira accepted the present; and when Hercules proved faithless to her bed, she sent him the centaur's tunic, which instantly caused his death. Vid. Hercules. Dejanira was so disconsolate at the death of her husband, which she had ignorantly occasioned, that she destroyed herself. Ovid. Met. 8 and 9.—Diod. 4.—Senec. in Hercul.—Hygin. fab. 34.

Deidamia, I. a daughter of Lycomedes, king of Scyros. She bore a son called Pyrrhus, or Neoptolemus, to Achilles, who was disguised at her father's court in women's clothes, under the name of Pyrra. Propert. 2, el. 9.—Apollod. 3. c. 13.——II. A daughter of Adrastus, king of Argos, called also Hippodamia.

Demilichus, a son of Neleus and Chloris, was killed, with all his brothers, except Nestor, by Hercules. Apollod. 1, c. 9.

Deiōneus, a king of Phocis, who married Diomede, daughter of Xuthus, by whom he had Dia. He gave his daughter Dia in marriage to Ixion, who promised to make a present to his father-in-law. Deioneus accordingly visited the house of Ixion, and was thrown into a large hole, filled with burning coals, by his son-in-law. Hygin. fab. 48 and 241.—Apollod. 1, c. 7 and 9, l. 2, c. 4.

Deiopēia, a nymph, the fairest of all the fourteen nymphs that attended upon Juno. The goddess promised her in marriage to Æolus, the god of the winds, if he would destroy the fleet of Æneas, which was sailing for Italy Virg. Æn. 1, v. 75.

Deiphōbe, a Sibyl of Cumæ, daughter of Glaucus. It is supposed that she led Æneas to the infernal regions. Vid. Sibyllæ. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 36.

Deiphōbus, a son of Hippolytus, who purified Hercules after the murder of Iphitus. Apollod. 2, c. 6. Vid. Part II.

Deiphon, a brother of Triptolemus, son of Celeus and Metanira. When Ceres travelled over the world, she stopped at his father's court, and undertook to nurse him and bring him up. To reward the hospitality of Celeus, the goddess began to make his son immortal, and every evening she placed him upon burning coals to purify him from whatever mortal particles he still possessed. The uncommon growth of Deiphon astonished Metanira, who wished to see what Ceres did to make him so vigorous. She was frightened to see her son on burning coals, and the shrieks that she uttered disturbed the mysterious operations of the goddess, and Deiphon perished in the flames. Apollod. 1, c. 5.

Dēipўle, a daughter of Adrastus, who married Tydeus, by whom she had Diomedes. Apollod. 1, c. 8.

Delia, a surname of Diana, because she was born in Delos. Virg. Ecl. 3, v. 67.

Delius, a surname of Apollo, because he was born in Delos.

Delphicus, a surname of Apollo, from the worship paid to his divinity at Delphi.

Delphus, a son of Apollo, who built Delphi, and consecrated it to his father. The name of his mother is differently mentioned. She is called by some, Celæno, by others, Melæne, daughter of Cephis, and by others Thyas, daughter of Castalius, the first who was priestess to Bacchus. Hygin. 161.—Paus. 10, c. 6.

Demŏcoon. Vid. Part II.

Dēmŏdice, the wife of Cretheus, king of Iolchos. Some call her Biadice, or Tyro. Hygin. P. A. 2, c. 20.

Demŏdŏchus, a musician at the court of Alcinous, who sang, in the presence of Ulysses, the secret amours of Mars and Venus, &c. Homer. Od. 8, v. 44.—Plut. de Mus.

Demophĭle, a name given to the Sibyl of Cumæ, who, as it is supposed by some, sold the Sibylline books to Tarquin. Varro apud Lact. 1, c. 6.

Dēmŏphoon, son of Theseus and Phædra, was king of Athens, B. C. 1182, and reigned 33 years. At his return from the Trojan war he visited Thrace, where he was tenderly received and treated by Phyllis. He retired to Athens, and forgot the kindness and love of Phyllis, who hanged herself in despair. Ovid. Heroid. 2.—Paus. 10, c. 55.

Deōis, a name given to Proserpine from her mother Ceres, who was called Deo. This name Ceres received, because when she sought her daughter all over the world, all wished her success in her pursuits, with the word δησις, invenies; a δηω, invenio. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 114.

Dercĕto, and Dercĕtis, a goddess of Syria, called also Atergatis, whom some suppose to be the same as Astarte. She was represented as a beautiful woman above the waist, and the lower part terminated in a fish's tail. According to Diodorus, Venus, whom she had offended, made her passionately fond of a young priest, remarkable for the beauty of his features. She had a daughter by him, and became so ashamed of her incontinence, that she removed her lover, exposed the fruit of her amour, and threw herself into a lake. Her body was transformed into a fish, and her child was preserved and called Semiramis. As she was chiefly worshipped in Syria, and represented like a fish, the Syrians anciently abstained from fishes. Those who believe they can find in the sacred writings the archetype of all mythology, consider this Decerto to be a personification of the lunar ark, and the continual reference to aquatic animals as proof of an analogy too strong for mere coincidence. Fab. Cab.—Lucian. de Deâ Ser.—Plin. 5, c. 13.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 44.—Diod. 2.

Deucalion, a son of Prometheus, who married Pyrrha, the daughter of Epimetheus. He reigned over part of Thessaly, and in his age the whole earth was overwhelmed with a deluge. The impiety of mankind had irritated Jupiter, who resolved to destroy mankind. Prometheus advised his son to make himself a ship, and by this means he saved himself and his wife Pyrrha. This vessel was tossed about during nine successive days, and at last stopped on the top of mount Parnassus, where Deucalion remained till the waters had subsided. As soon as the waters had retired from the surface of the earth, Deucalion and his wife went to consult the oracle of Themis, and were directed to repair the loss of mankind by throwing behind them the bones of their grandmother. This was nothing but the stones of the earth; and, after some hesitation about the meaning of the oracle, they obeyed. The stones thrown by Deucalion became men, and those of Pyrrha, women. According to Justin, Deucalian was not the only one who escaped from the universal calamity. Many saved their lives by ascending the highest mountains, or trusting themselves in small vessels to the mercy of the waters. This deluge, which chiefly happened in Thessaly, according to the relation of some writers, was produced by the inundation of the waters of the river Peneus, whose regular course was stopped by an earthquake near mount Ossa and Olympus. According to Xenophon there were no less than five deluges. The first happened under Ogyges, and lasted three months. The second, which was in the age of Hercules and Prometheus, continued but one month. During the third, which happened in the reign of another Ogyges, all Attica was laid waste by the waters. Thessaly was totally covered by the waters during the fourth, which happened in the age of Deucalion. The last was during the Trojan war, and its effects were severely felt by the inhabitants of Egypt. There prevailed a report in Attica, that the waters of Deucalion's deluge had disappeared through a small aperture, about a cubit wide, near Jupiter Olympus's temple; and Pausanias, who saw it, further adds, that a yearly offering of flour and honey was thrown into it with religious ceremony. The deluge of Deucalion, so much celebrated in ancient history is supposed to have happened 1503 years B. C. Deucalion had two sons by Pyrrha, Hellen, called by some son of Jupiter, and Amphictyon, king of Attica, and also a daughter, Protogenea, who became mother of Æthlius by Jupiter. The history of Deucalion, his birthplace, his adventures, and his name, have formed the subject of much learned argument. Some conduct him from the Peloponnesus into Thessaly, whence they send forth his children to colonize the regions which have since become classic; others, with abundant evidence, trace his march into Europe from Asia, and infer the Caucasian origin of the European Greeks from the emigration of this notorious personage. Etymology establishes his connection with the mysteries of the early Arkite superstitions, and analogy converts him into the great Jewish patriarch. In such confusion it cannot be unsafe to consider Deucalion as a mythological personage, and to suspect that his descendants, Dorus, Æolus, &c., are later names than Doris and Æolia. The flood, however, which is said in his time to have desolated Thessaly, may serve, by the aid of geological investigations, in fixing the period of the early populating of Greece; and was, perhaps, among the last of those great catastrophes which form, as it were, eras in the geological revolutions of the earth. The opinions, of Banier and Malte Brun, though not altogether in accordance, are both highly worthy of consideration. The former supposes that about 884 years after the universal deluge, in consequence of an earthquake in those parts, the Peneus became obstructed at its mouth, and its waters, being greatly increased by rains that had fallen before, the country on its banks (according to Aristotle, the region of Dodona and of the Achelous) was inundated. The latter attributes the natural appearance of those regions to the shifting nature of the soil, which exposes it to continual changes on the surface, in consequence of its tendency to sink. Pind. 9, Olymp.—*Ovid. Dia, a daughter of Deion, mother of Pirithous by Ixion. Vid. Part II.

Diana, was the goddess of hunting. According to Cicero, there were three of this name: a daughter of Jupiter and Proserpine, who became mother of Cupid; a daughter of Jupiter and Latona; and a daughter of Upis and Glauce. The second is the most celebrated, and to her all the ancients allude. She was born at the same birth as Apollo; and she obtained from her father the permission to live in perpetual celibacy, and to preside over the travails of women. To shun the society of men, she devoted herself to hunting, and obtained the permission of Jupiter to have for her attendants 60 of the Oceanides, and 20 other nymphs, all of whom, like herself, abjured the use of marriage. She is represented with a bent bow and quiver, and attended with dogs, and sometimes drawn in a chariot by two white stags. Sometimes she appears with wings, holding a lion in one hand and a panther in the other, with a chariot drawn by two heifers, or two horses of different colours. She is represented taller by the head than her attendant nymphs, her face has something manly, her legs are bare, well shaped and strong, and her feet are covered with a buskin, worn by huntresses among the ancients. Diana received many surnames, particularly from the places where her worship was established, and from the functions over which she presided. She was called Lucina, Ilythia, or Juno Pronuba, when invoked by women in childbed; and Trivia when worshipped in the cross-ways, where her statues were generally erected. She was supposed to be the same as the moon, and Proserpine or Hecate, and from that circumstance she was called Triformis; and some of her statues represented her with three heads, that of a horse, a dog, and a boar. Her power and functions under these three characters have been beautifully expressed in these two verses:

Terret, lustrat, agit, Proserpina, Luna, Diana:
Ima, suprema, feras, sceptro, fulgore, sagittâ.

She was also called Agrotera, Orthia, Taurica, Delia, Cynthia, Aricia, &c. She was supposed to be the same as the Isis of the Egyptians, whose worship was introduced into Greece with that of Osiris, under the name of Apollo. When Typhon waged war against the gods, Diana is said to have metamorphosed herself into a cat, to avoid his fury. The goddess is generally known in the figures that represent her by the crescent on her head, by the dogs which attend her, and by her hunting habit. The most famous of her temples was that of Ephesus, which was one of the seven wonders of the world. Vid. Ephesus. She was there represented with a great number of breasts, and other symbols, which signified the earth or Cybele. The inhabitants of Taurica were particularly attached to the worship of this goddess, and they cruelly offered on her altar all the strangers that were shipwrecked on their coasts. Her temple in Aricia was served by a priest who had always murdered his predecessor, and the Lacedæmonians yearly offered her human victims till the age of Lycurgus, who changed this barbarous custom for the sacrifice of flagellation. The Athenians generally offered her goats, and others a white kid, and sometimes a boar pig, or an ox. Among plants the poppy and the ditamy were sacred to her. She, as well as her brother Apollo, had some oracles, among which those of Egypt, Cilicia, and Ephesus, are the most known. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 155. Met. 3, v. 156, l. 7, v. 94 and 194, &c.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3.—Horat. 3, od. 22.—Virg. G. 3, v. 302. Æn. 1, v. 505.—Homer. Od. 5.—Paus. 8, c. 31 and 37.—Catull.—Stat. 3, Silv. 1, v. 57.—Apollod. 1, c. 4, &c., l. 3, c. 5, &c.

Dictynna, a nymph of Crete, who first invented hunting nets. She was one of Diana's attendants, and for that reason the goddess is often called Dictynnia. There was a festival at Sparta in honour of Diana, called Dictynnia. She is said to have given name to mount Dicte. Paus. 2, c. 30, l. 3, c. 12.

Dictys, a king of the island of Seriphus, son of Magnes and Nais. He married the nymph Clymene, and was made king of Seriphus by Perseus, who deposed Polydectes, because he behaved with wantonness to Danae. Vid. Polydectes. Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 2, c. 4. Vid. Part II.

Didymæus, a surname of Apollo.

Diespiter, a surname of Jupiter, as being the father of light.

Dii, the divinities of the ancient inhabitants of the earth were very numerous. They were endowed with understanding, and were actuated by the same passions which daily afflict the human race; and those children of superstition were appeased or provoked as the imperfect being which gave them birth. Their wrath was mitigated by sacrifices and incense; and sometimes human victims bled to expiate a crime which superstition alone supposed to exist. The sun, from its powerful influence and animating nature, first attracted the notice and claimed the adoration of the uncivilized inhabitants of the earth. The moon also was honoured with sacrifices and addressed in prayers; and after immortality had been liberally bestowed on all the heavenly bodies, mankind classed among their deities the brute creation, and the cat and the sow shared equally with Jupiter himself, the father of gods and men, the devout veneration of their votaries. This immense number of deities have been divided into different classes, according to the will and pleasure of the mythologists. The Romans, generally speaking, reckoned two classes of the gods, the dii majorum gentium, or dii consulentes, and the dii minorum gentium. The former were twelve in number, six males and six females. Vid. Consentes. In the class of the latter were ranked all the gods who were worshipped in different parts of the earth. Besides these, there were some called dii selecti, sometimes classed with the twelve greater gods; these were Janus, Saturn, the Genius, the Moon, Pluto, and Bacchus. There were also some called demi-gods, that is, who deserved immortality by the greatness of their exploits, and for their uncommon services to mankind. Among these were Priapus, Vertumnus, Hercules, and those whose parents were some of the immortal gods. Besides these, there were some called topici, whose worship was established at particular places, such as Isis in Egypt, Astarte in Syria, Uranus at Carthage, &c. In process of time, also, all the passions and the moral virtues were reckoned as powerful deities; and temples were raised to a goddess of concord, peace, &c. According to the authority of Hesiod, there were no less than 30,000 gods that inhabited the earth, and were guardians of men, all subservient to the power of Jupiter. To these succeeding ages have added an almost equal number; and indeed they were so numerous, and their functions so various, that we find temples erected and sacrifices offered to unknown gods. It is observable, that all the gods of the ancients have lived upon earth as mere mortals; and even Jupiter, who was the ruler of heaven is represented by the mythologists as a helpless child; and we are acquainted with all the particulars that attended the birth and education of Juno. In process of time, not only good and virtuous men, who had been the patrons of learning and the supporters of liberty, but also thieves and pirates, were admitted among the gods; and the Roman senate courteously granted immortality to the most cruel and abandoned of their emperors.

Diogĕnia, a daughter of the Cephisus, who married Erechtheus. Apollod.

Diŏmēdēs, a king of Thrace, son of Mars and Cyrene, who fed his horses with human flesh. It was one of the labours of Hercules to destroy him; and accordingly the hero, attended with some of his friends, attacked the inhuman tyrant, and gave him to be devoured by his own horses whom he had fed so barbarously. Diod. 4.—Paus. 3. c. 18.—Apol. 2, c. 5. Vid. Part II.

Diŏnæa, a surname of Venus, supposed to be the daughter of Jupiter and Dione.

Diŏne, a nymph, daughter of Nereus and Doris. She was mother of Venus, by Jupiter, according to Homer and others. Hesiod, however gives Venus a different origin. Venus is herself sometimes called Dione. Virg. 3, Æn. v. 19.—Homer. Il. 5, v. 381.—Stat. 1, Sylv. 1, v. 86.

Dionȳsus, a surname of Bacchus.

Dioscūri, or sons of Jupiter, a name given to Castor and Pollux. There were festivals in their honour, called Dioscuria, celebrated by the people of Corcyra, and chiefly by the Lacedæmonians. They were observed with much jovial festivity. The people made a free use of the gifts of Bacchus, and diverted themselves with sports, of which wrestling matches always made a part.

Diræ, the daughters of Acheron and Nox, who persecuted the souls of the guilty. They are the same as the Furies, and some suppose that they are called Furies in hell, Harpies on earth, and Diræ in heaven. They were represented as standing near the throne of Jupiter, in an attitude which expressed their eagerness to receive his orders, and the power of tormenting the guilty on earth with the most excruciating punishments. Vir. Æn. 4, v. 473, l. 8, v. 701.

Dircæ. Vid. Amphion, Antiope.

Dirphya, a surname of Juno, from Dirphys, a mountain of Bœotia, where the goddess had a temple.

Dis, a god of the Gauls, the same as Pluto the god of hell. The inhabitants of Gaul supposed themselves descended from that deity. Cæs. Bell. G. 6.—Tacit. 4, Hist. c. 84.

Discordia, a malevolent deity, daughter of Nox, and sister to Nemesis, the Parcæ, and Death. She was driven from heaven by Jupiter, because she sowed dissensions among the gods, and was the cause of continued quarrels. When the nuptials of Peleus and Thetis were celebrated, the goddess of discord was not invited, and this seeming neglect so irritated her, that she threw an apple into the midst of the assembly of the gods with the inscription of detur pulchriori. This apple was the cause of the ruin of Troy, and of infinite misfortunes to the Greeks. Vid. Paris. She is represented with a pale ghastly look, her garment is torn, her eyes sparkle with fire, and in her bosom she holds a dagger concealed. Her head is generally entwined with serpents, and she is attended by Bellona. She is supposed to be the cause of all the dissensions, murders, wars, and quarrels, which arise upon earth, public as well as private. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 702.—Hesiod. Theogn. 225.—Petronius.

Dithyrambus, a surname of Bacchus, whence the hymns sung in his honour were called Dithyrambics. Horat. 4, od. 2.

Divi, a name chiefly appropriated to those who were made gods after death, such as heroes and warriors, or the Lares and Penates, and other domestic gods.

Dōdōna. Vid. Part I

Dōlon, a Trojan, son of Eumedes, famous for his swiftness. Being sent by Hector to spy the Grecian camp by night, he was seized by Diomedes and Ulysses, to whom he revealed the situation, schemes, and resolutions of his countrymen, with the hopes of escaping with his life. He was put to death by Diomedes as a traitor. Homer. Il. 10, v. 314.—Virg. Æn. 12. v. 349, &c.

Domĭdūcus, a god who presided over marriage. Juno also was called Domiduca, from the power she was supposed to have in marriages.

Dōris, a goddess of the sea, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. She married her brother Nereus, by whom she had 50 daughters called Nereides. Her name is often used to express the sea itself. Propert. 1, el. 17, v. 25.—Virg. Ecl. 10.—Hesiod. Theog. 240.

Dōrus. Vid. Part II.

Drances, a friend of Latinus, remarkable for his weakness and eloquence. He showed himself an obstinate opponent to the violent measures which Turnus pursued against the Trojans. Some have imagined that the poet wished to delineate the character and the eloquence of Cicero under this name. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 122.

Dromæus, a surname of Apollo in Crete.

Druĭdæ, the ministers of religion among the ancient Gauls and Britons. They were divided into different classes, called the Bardi, Eubages, the Vates, the Semnothei, the Sarronides, and the Samothei. They were held in the greatest veneration by the people. Their life was austere and recluse from the world; their dress was peculiar to themselves, and they generally appeared with a tunic which reached a little below the knee. As the chief power was lodged in their hands, they punished as they pleased, and could declare war and make peace at their option. Their power was extended not only over private families, but they could depose magistrates, and even kings, if their actions in any manner deviated from the laws of the state. They had the privilege of naming the magistrates which annually presided over their cities; and the kings were created only with their approbation. They were intrusted with the education of youth, and all religious ceremonies, festivals, and sacrifices, were under their peculiar care. They taught the doctrine of the metempsychosis, and believed the immortality of the soul. They were professionally acquainted with the art of magic, and from their knowledge of astrology, they drew omens, and saw futurity revealed before their eyes. In their sacrifices they often immolated human victims to their gods; a barbarous custom, which continued long among them, and which the Roman emperors attempted to abolish to little purpose. The power and privileges which they enjoyed were beheld with admiration by their countrymen, and as their office was open to every rank and every station, there were many who daily proposed themselves as candidates to enter upon this important function. The rigour, however, and severity of a long noviciate deterred many, and few were willing to attempt a labour which enjoined them, during 15 or 20 years, to load their memory with the long and tedious maxims of druidical religion. Their name is derived from the Greek word δρυς, an oak, because the woods and solitary retreats were the places of their residence. Cæs. Bell. G. 6, c. 13.—Plin. 16, c. 44.—Diod. 5.

Dryades, and Hamadryades, a number of wood nymphs. The former class presided over the forests at large, through which they roamed, but the latter were attached individually to the trees. Every forest had its Dryad and every tree its Hamadryad, which, being born with its birth and growing with its growth, became extinct by its decay. Oblations of milk, oil, and honey, were offered to them, and sometimes the votaries sacrificed a goat. Virg. G. 1, v. 11.

Dryas, I. a son of Hippolocus, who was father to Lycurgus. He went with Eteocles to the Theban war, where he perished. Stat. Theb. 8, v. 355.——II. A son of Mars, who went to the chase of the Calydonian boar. Apol. 2, c. 8.——III. A daughter of Faunus, who so hated the sight of men that she never appeared in public.

Dryŏpe, I. a woman of Lemnos, whose shape Venus assumed, to persuade all the females of the island to murder the men. Flacc. 2, v. 174.——II. A virgin of Œchalia, whom Andræmon married after she had been ravished by Apollo. She became mother of the Amphisus, who, when scarce a year old, was with his mother changed into a lotus. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 331.——III. A nymph of Arcadia, mother of Pan by Mercury, according to Homer. hymn. in Pan.

Dusii, some deities among the Gauls. August. de C. D. 15, c. 23.

Eanes, a man supposed to have killed Patroclus, and to have fled to Peleus in Thessaly. Strab. 9.

Eănus, the name of Janus among the ancient Latins.

Ebon, a name given to Bacchus by the people of Neapolis. Macrob. 1, c. 18.

Echidna, a celebrated monster, sprung from the union of Chrysaor with Callirhoe, the daughter of Oceanus. She is represented as a beautiful woman in the upper parts of the body, but as a serpent below the waist. She was mother, by Typhon, of Orthos, Geryon, Cerberus, the Hydra, &c. According to Herodotus, Hercules had three children by her, Agathyrsus, Gelonus, and Scytha. Herod. 3, c. 108.—Hesiod. Theog.—Apol. 2.—Paus. 8, c. 18.—Ovid, Met. 9, v. 158.

Echion, I. one of those men who sprung from the dragon's teeth sown by Cadmus. He was one of the five who survived the fate of his brothers, and assisted Cadmus in building the city of Thebes. Cadmus rewarded his services by giving him his daughter Agave in marriage. He was father of Pentheus by Agave. He succeeded his father-in-law on the throne of Thebes, as some have imagined, and from that circumstance Thebes has been called Echioniæ, and the inhabitants Echionidæ. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 311.—Trist. 5, el. 5, v. 53.——II. A son of Mercury and Antianira, who was the herald of the Argonauts. Flacc. 1, v. 400.

Echionides, a patronymic given to Pentheus as descended from Echion. Ovid. Met. 3.

Echo, a daughter of the Air and Tellus, who chiefly resided in the vicinity of the Cephisus. She was one of Juno's attendants, and became the confident of Jupiter's amours. Her loquacity, however, displeased Jupiter; and she was deprived of the power of speech by Juno, and only permitted to answer to the questions which were put to her. Pan had formerly been one of her admirers, but he never enjoyed her favours. Echo, after she had been punished by Juno, fell in love with Narcissus, and, on being despised by him, she pined away, and was changed into a stone, which still retained the power of voice. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 358.

ETION. Vid. Part II.

EGĔRIA, a nymph of Aricia, in Italy, where Diana was particularly worshipped. Egeria was courted by Numa, and, according to Ovid, she became his wife. This prince frequently visited her; and that he might more successfully introduce his laws and new regulations into the state, he solemnly declared, before the Roman people, that they were previously sanctified and approved by the nymph Egeria. Ovid says that Egeria was so disconsolate at the death of Numa, that she melted into tears, and was changed into a fountain by Diana. She is reckoned by many as a goddess who presided over the pregnancy of women; and some maintain that she is the same as Lucina, or Diana. Liv. 1, c. 19.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 547.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 775.—Martial, 2, ep. 6, v. 16.

EIONEUS, a Thracian, father to Rhesus. *Id.*10.

ELAGABĂLUS. Vid Heliogabalus.

ELAPHIÆA, a surname of Diana in Elis. Paus. 6, c. 22.

ELECTRA, one of the Oceanides, wife of Atlas, and mother of Dardanus, by Jupiter. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 31. Vid. Part II.

ELECTRYON, a king of Argos, son of Perseus and Andromeda. He was brother to Alcæus, whose daughter Anaxo he married, and by her he had several sons and one daughter, Alcmene. Vid. Amphitryon and Alcmena. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Paus.

ELĔLĔUS, a surname of Bacchus, from the word ελελευ, which the Bacchanals loudly repeated during his festivals. His priestesses were in consequence called Eleleis-ides. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 15.

ELEPHĒNOR, son of Chalcedon, was one of Helen's suiters. Homer. Il. 2, v. 47.

ELEUTHER, I. a son of Apollo.——II. One of the Curetes, from whom a town of Bœotia, and another in Crete, received their name. Paus. 9, c. 2 and 19.

ELEUTHO, a surname of Juno Lucina. Pindar. Olymp. 6.

ELĬCIUS, a surname of Jupiter, worshipped on mount Aventine. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 328.

ELPĒNOR, one of the companions of Ulysses, changed into a hog by Circe's potions, and afterwards restored to his former shape. He fell from the top of a house where he was sleeping, and was killed. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 252.—Homer. Od. 10, v. 552, l. 11, v. 51.

ELŸSIUM, and ELYSII CAMPI, a place or island in the infernal regions, where, according to the mythology of the ancients, the souls of the virtuous were placed after death. The employment of the heroes who dwelt in those regions of bliss were various; the manes of Achilles are represented as waging war with wild beasts, while the Trojan chiefs are innocently exercising themselves in managing horses or in handling arms. To these innocent amusements some poets have added continual feasting and revelry, and they suppose that the Elysian fields were filled with all the incontinence and voluptuousness which could gratify the low desires of the debauchee. The Elysian fields were, according to some, in the Fortunate Islands on the coast of Africa, in the Atlantic. Others place them in the island of Leuce; and, according to the authority of Virgil, they were situate in Italy. According to Lucian they were near the moon, or in the centre of the earth according to Plutarch. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 638.—Homer. Od. 4.—Pindar.—Tibull. 1, el. 3, v. 57.—Lucian.—Plut. de Consul.

EMĂTHION, a son of Titan and Aurora, who reigned in Macedonia. The country was called Ematkia from his name. Some suppose that he was a famous robber, destroyed by Hercules. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 313.—Justin. 7, c. 1.

ENCĔLĂDUS, a son of Titan and Terra, the most powerful of all the giants who conspired against Jupiter. He was struck by Jupiter's thunders, and overwhelmed under mount Ætna. Some suppose that he is the same as Typhon. According to the poets, the flames of Ætna proceeded from the breath of Enceladus; and as often as he turned his weary side, the whole island of Sicily felt the motion and shook from its very foundations. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 578, &c.

ENDEIS, a nymph, daughter of Chiron. She married Æacus king of Egina, by whom she had Peleus and Telamon. Paus. 2, c. 29.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.

ENDŸMION, a shepherd, son of Æthlius and Calyce. It is said that he required of Jupiter to grant to him to be always young, and to sleep as much as he would; whence came the proverb of Endymionis somnum dormire, to express a long sleep. Diana was so struck with his beauty, that she came down from heaven every night to enjoy his company. Endymion married Chromia, daughter of Itonus, or, according to some, Hyperipna, daughter of Arcas, by whom he had three sons, Pæon, Epeus, and Æolus, and a daughter called Eurydice; and so little ambitious did he show himself of sovereignty, that he made his crown the prize of the best racer among his sons, an honourable distinction which was gained by Epeus. The fable of Endymion's amours with Diana, or the moon, arises from his knowledge of astronomy; and as he passed the night on some high mountain, to observe the heavenly bodies, it has been reported that he was courted by the moon. Some suppose that there were two of that name, the son of a king of Elis, and the shepherd or astronomer of Caria. The people of Heraclea maintained that Endymion died on mount Latmos, and the Eleans pretended to show his tomb at Olympia in Peloponnesus. Propert. 2, el. 15.—Cic. Tusc. 1.—Juv. 10.—Theocrit. 3.—Paus. 5, c. 1, l. 6, c. 20.

ENTELLUS. Vid. Part II.

ENŸO, a sister of Mars, called by the Latins Bellona, supposed by some to be the daughter of Phorcys and Ceto. Val. 10, v. 203.

EOS, the name of Aurora among the Greeks, whence the epithet Eous is applied to all the eastern parts of the world. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 406. A. A. 3, v. 537, l. 6, v. 478.—Virg. G. 1, v. 288, l. 2, v. 115.

EPĂPHUS, a son of Jupiter and Io, who founded a city in Egypt, which he called Memphis, in honour of his wife, who was the daughter of the Nile. He had a daughter called Libya, who became mother of Ægyptus and Danaus by Neptune. He was worshipped as a god at Memphis. Herodot. 2, c. 153.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 699, &c.

Epeus, I. a son of Endymion, brother to Pæon, who reigned in a part of Peloponnesus. His subjects were called from him Epi. Paus. 5, c. 1.——II. A son of Panopeus, who was the fabricator of the famous wooden horse which proved the ruin of Troy. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 264.—Justin. 20, c. 2.—Paus. 10, c. 26.

Ephialtes, or Ephialtus. Vid. Aloeus, Part II.

Epicaste, I. a name of Jocasta, the mother and wife of Œdipus. Paus. 9, c. 5.——II. A daughter of Ægeus, mother of Thessalus by Hercules.

Epidotæ, certain deities who presided over the birth and growth of children, and were known among the Romans by the name of Dii averrunci. They were worshipped by the Lacedæmonians, and chiefly invoked by those who were persecuted by the ghosts of the dead, &c. Paus. 2, c. 17, &c.

Epigoni. Vid. Part II.

Epimetheus, a son of Japetus and Clymene, one of the Oceanides, who inconsiderately married Pandora, by whom he had Pyrrha, the wife of Deucalion. Epimetheus was changed into a monkey by the gods, and sent into the island of Pithacusa. Apol. 1, c. 2 and 7.—Hyg. fab.—Hes. Theog. Vid. Prometheus and Pandora.

Epiochus, a son of Lycurgus, who received divine honours in Arcadia.

Epopeus, I. a son of Neptune and Canace, who came from Thessaly to Sicyon, and carried away Antiope, daughter of Nycteus, king of Thebes. This rape was followed by a war, in which Nycteus and Epopeus were both killed. Paus. 2, c. 6.—Apol. 1, c. 7, &c.——II. A son of Aloeus, grandson to Phœbus. He reigned at Corinth. Paus. 2, c. 1 and 3.——III. one of the Tyrrhene sailors who attempted to abuse Bacchus. Ovid Met. 3, v. 619. Vid. Æmaria.

Erato, one of the Muses, who presided over lyric, tender, and amorous poetry. She is represented as crowned with roses and myrtle, holding in her right hand a lyre, and a lute in her left, musical instruments of which she is considered by some as the inventress. Love is sometimes placed by her side holding a lighted flambeau, while she herself appears with a thoughtful, but oftener with a gay and animated look. She was invoked by lovers, especially in the month of April, which among the Romans, was more particularly devoted to love. Apollod. 10.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 37.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 2, v. 425. Vid. Part II.

Erebus, a deity of hell, son of Chaos and Darkness. He married Night, by whom he had the light and the day. The poets often used the word Erebus to signify hell itself, and particularly that part where dwelt the souls of those who had lived a virtuous life, from whence they passed into the Elysian fields. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 17.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 26.

Erechtheus, a son of Pandion 1st, was the sixth king of Athens. He was father of Cecrops 2d, Metion, Pandorus, and four daughters, Creusa, Orithya, Procris, and Othonia, by Praxithea. In a war against Eleusis he sacrificed Othonia, called also Chthonia, to obtain a victory which the oracle promised for such a sacrifice. In that war he killed Eumolpus, Neptune's son, who was the general of the enemy, for which he was struck with thunder by Jupiter, at Neptune's request. Some say that he was drowned in the sea. After death he received divine honours at Athens. He reigned 50 years, and died B. C. 1347. According to some accounts he first introduced the mysteries of Ceres at Eleusis. Ovid. 6, v. 877.—Paus. 2, c. 25.—Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Cic. pro Sext. 21. —Tusc. 1, c. 48.—Nat. D. 3, c. 15.

Erginus, a king of Orchomenos, son of Clymenus. He obliged the Thebans to pay him a yearly tribute of 100 oxen, because his father had been killed by a Theban. Hercules attacked his servants, who came to raise the tribute, and mutilated them, and he afterwards killed Erginus, who attempted to avenge their death by invading Bœotia with an army. Paus. 9, c. 17.

Erginus, a man made master of the ship Argo by the Argonauts, after the death of Typhis.

Erichthonius, I. the fourth king of Athens. He was very deformed, and had the tails of serpents instead of legs. Minerva placed him in a basket, which she gave to the daughters of Cecrops, with strict injunctions not to examine its contents. Vid. Herse. Erichthon was young when he ascended the throne of Athens. He reigned 50 years, and died B. C. 1437. The invention of chariots is attributed to him, and the manner of harnessing horses to draw them. He was made a constellation after death, under the name of Bootes. Ovid Met. 2, v. 553.—Hygin. fab. 166.—Apollod. 3, c. 14.—Paus. 4, c. 2.—Virg. G. 3, v. 113.——II. A son of Dardanus who reigned in Troy, and died 1374 B. C., after a long reign of about 75 years. Apollod. 3, c. 10.

Erigone, I. a daughter of Icarius, who hung herself when she heard that her father had been killed by some shepherds whom he had intoxicated. She was made a constellation, now known under the name of Virgo. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 4.—Stat. 11. Theb. v. 644.—Virg. G. 1, v. 33.—Apol. 3, c. 14.—Hyg. fab. 1 and 24. Vid. Part II.——II. A daughter of Ægysthus and Clytemnestra, priestess of Diana in Attica.

Erinnys, I. the Greek name of the Eumenides. The word signifies the fury of the mind, ἐπὶς νους. Vid. Eumenides. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 337.——II. A surname of Ceres.

Eriphyle, a sister of Adrastus, king of Argos, who married Amphiaraus. She was daughter of Talaus and Lysimache. Vid. Amphiaraus.

Eris, the goddess of discord among the Greeks. She is the same as the Discordia of the Latins. Vid. Discordia.

Erisicthon, a Thessalian, son of Triops, who derided Ceres and cut down her groves. This impiety irritated the goddess, who afflicted him with continual hunger. He squandered all his possessions to gratify the cravings of his appetite, and at last he devoured his own limbs for want of food. His daughter Metra had the power of transforming herself into whatever animal she pleased, and she made use of that artifice to maintain her father, who sold her, after which she assumed another shape and became again his property. Ovid. Met. fab. 18.

Eros. Vid. Cupido, and Part II.

Erse. Vid. Herse.

Erycina, a surname of Venus, from mount Eryx, where she had a temple. She was also worshipped at Rome under this appellation. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 874.—Horat. 1. Od. 2, v. 33.

Eryx, a son of Butes and Venus, who, relying upon his strength, challenged all strangers to fight with him in the combat of the cestus. Hercules accepted his challenge after many had yielded to his superior dexterity, and Eryx was killed in the combat, and buried on the mountain which bears his name in Sicily, and on which he had built a temple to Venus. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 402.

Eteŏcles, a son of Œdipus and Jocasta. After his father's death, it was agreed between him and his brother Polynices, that they should both share the royalty, and reign alternately each a year. Eteocles, by right of seniority, first ascended the throne, but after the first year of his reign was expired, he refused to give up the crown to his brother according to their mutual agreement. Polynices, resolving to punish such an open violation of a solemn engagement, went to implore the assistance of Adrastus, king of Argos. He received that king's daughter in marriage, and was soon after assisted with a strong army, headed by seven famous generals. These hostile preparations were watched by Eteocles, who on his part did not remain inactive. He chose seven brave chiefs to oppose the seven leaders of the Argives, and stationed them at the seven gates of the city. He placed himself against his brother Polynices, and he opposed Menalippus to Tydeus, Polyphontes to Capaneus, Megareus to Eteoclus, Hiperbius to Parthenopæus, and Lasthenes to Amphiaraus. Much blood was shed in light and unavailing skirmishes, and it was at last agreed between the two brothers that the war should be decided by single combat. They both fell in an engagement conducted with the most inveterate fury on either side; and it is even said that the ashes of these two brothers, who had been so inimical one to the other, separated themselves on the burning pile, as if, even after death, sensible of resentment and hostile to reconciliation. Stat. Theb.—Apollod. 3, c. 5, &c.—Æschyl. Sept. ante Theb.—Eurip. in Phœnis.—Paus. 5, c. 9, l. 9, c. 6.

Eteŏclus, one of the seven chiefs of the army of Adrastus in his expedition against Thebes, celebrated for his valour, for his disinterestedness and magnanimity. He was killed by Megareus, the son of Creon, under the walls of Thebes. Eurip.—Apollod. 3, c. 6.

Evadne, a daughter of Iphis or Iphicles, of Argos, who slighted the addresses of Apollo, and married Capaneus, one of the seven chiefs who went against Thebes. When her husband had been struck with thunder by Jupiter for his blasphemies and impiety, and his ashes had been separated from those of the rest of the Argives, she threw herself on his burning pile and perished in the flames. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 447. Propert. 1, el. 15, v. 21.—Stat. Theb. 12, v. 800.

Evan, a surname of Bacchus, which he received from the wild ejaculation of Evan! Evan! by his priestesses. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 15. —Virg. Æn. 6, v. 517.

Evander. Vid. Part II.

Everes, a son of Peteralaus, the only one of his family who did not perish in a battle against Electryon. Apollod. 2.

Evius, a surname of Bacchus. given him in the war of the giants against Jupiter. Horat. 2, Od. 11, v. 17.

Evippe, the mother of the Pierides, who were changed into magpies. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 303.

Evippus, a son of Thestius, king of Pleuron, killed by his brother Iphiclus in the chase of the Calydonian boar. Apollod. 1, c. 7.

Eumæus. Vid. Part II.

Eumēlus, I, a son of Admetus, king of Pheræ in Thessaly. He went to the Trojan war, and had the fleetest horses in the Grecian army. He distinguished himself in the games made in honour of Patroclus. Homer. Il. 2 and 23.—— II. A man contemporary with Triptolemus, of whom he learned the art of agriculture. Paus. 7, c. 18. Vid. Part II.

Eumēnides, a name given to the Furies by the ancients. They sprang from the drops of blood which flowed from the wound which Cœlus, received from his son Saturn. According to others they were daughters of the earth, and conceived from the blood of Saturn. Some make them daughters of Acheron and Night, or Pluto and Proserpine, or Chaos and Terra, according to Sophocles; or, as Epimenides reports, of Saturn and Evonyme. According to the most received opinions they were three in number, Tisiphone, Megara, and Alecto, to which some add Nemesis. Plutarch mentions only one, called Adrasta, daughter of Jupiter and Necessity. They were supposed to be the ministers of the vengeance of the gods, and therefore appeared stern and inexorable; always employed in punishing the guilty upon earth as well as in the infernal regions. They inflicted their vengeance upon earth by wars, pestilence, and dissensions, and by the secret stings of conscience; and in hell they punished the guilty by continual flagellation and torments. They were also called Furiæ, Erinnyes, and Diræ, and the appellation of Eumenides, which signifies benevolence and compassion, they received after they had ceased to prosecute Orestes, who in gratitude offered them sacrifices, and erected a temple in honour of their divinity. Their worship was almost universal, and people presumed not to mention their names or fix their eyes upon their temples. They were honoured with sacrifices and libations, and in Achaia they had a temple, which, when entered by any one guilty of crime, suddenly rendered him furious, and deprived him of the use of his reason. In their sacrifices the votaries used branches of cedar and of alder, hawthorn, saffron, and juniper; and the victims were generally turtle doves and sheep, with libations of wine and honey. They were generally represented with a grim and frightful aspect, with a black and bloody garment, and serpents wreathing round their heads instead of hair. They held a burning torch in one hand and a whip of scorpions in the other, and were always attended by terror, rage, paleness, and death. In hell they were seated around Pluto's throne, as the ministers of his vengeance. Æsch. in Eum.—Soph. in Œdip. Col.

Eumolpus, a king of Thrace, son of Neptune and Chione. He was thrown into the sea by his mother, who wished to conceal her shame from her father. Neptune saved his life, and carried him into Æthiopia, where he was brought up by Amphitrite, and afterwards by a woman of the country, one of whose daughters he married. An act of violence to his sister-in-law obliged him to leave Æthiopia, and he fled to Thrace with his son Ismarus, where he married the daughter of Tegyrius, the king of the country. This connexion with the royal family rendered him ambitious; he conspired against his father-in-law, and fled, when the conspiracy was discovered, to Attica, where he was initiated in the mysteries of Ceres of Eleusis, and made Hierophantes or high priest. He was afterwards reconciled to Tegyrius, and inherited his kingdom. He made war against Erechtheus, the king of Athens, who had appointed him to the office of high-priest, and perished in battle. His descendants were also invested with the priesthood, which remained for about 1200 years in that family. Vid. Eumolpidæ. Apollod. 2, c. 5, &c.—Hygin. fab. 73.—Diod. 5.—Paus. 2, c. 14.

Evocatio. There were among the ancients three species of Evocations: 1st, by magic to call up the dead; 2d, to withdraw, in cases of siege, &c., the protecting deity of the place besieged; and 3d, to enforce the presence and visible appearance of any divinity. Of these the first was practised in the remotest period; with the Hebrews it was among the things prohibited by the first lawgiver, and with the Greeks the early poet Orpheus is reputed the introducer, if not the inventor. In the time of Homer it was permitted to perform them openly, and as a profession. The most illustrious instances among the classic nations were, the Evocation of Eurydice by Orpheus, in Thrace, whence the fable perhaps of his descent into hell; the Evocation of Tiresias by Ulysses, in the country of the Cimmerians; and the less historical conference of Æneas with the shade of Anchises. In Jewish history the Evocation of Samuel may be placed beside the most famous of the above. The following form of invocation of the second kind is preserved in Macrobius:—"If there be to Carthage a protecting god or goddess, I pray and beseech ye great gods, who have taken into your care this city, to abandon these habitations, these temples, and these sacred places; to forget them, to fill them with terror, and to withdraw to Rome and to our people. May our dwellings, our temples, and our sacred offerings find favour before you. Let it appear that you are my protectors, the protectors of the Roman people and of my soldiers. If you do this, I pledge myself to found temples and to institute games in your honour." Of the third species of evocation, by which the presence of some deity was to be brought from any place over which he exercised a tutelar guardianship, to another in which his votary chanced to be, the still extant hymns attributed to Orpheus and Homer, those of Callimachus, the Carmen Seculare of Horace and others, remain as a specimen. Hom. Od.—Virg. Æn.—Macrob. Sat.—Hor. Carm. 2, 1, and note, Anthon's edition.—Callim.

Eupalamus, the father of Dædalus and of Matiadusa. Apollod. 3, c. 15.

Eupeithes, a prince of Ithaca, father to Antinous. In the former part of his life he had fled before the vengeance of the Thresprotians, whose territories he had laid waste in the pursuit of some pirates. During the absence of Ulysses he was one of the most importuning lovers of Penelope. Homer. Od. 16.

Euphēmus, a son of Neptune and Europa, who was among the Argonauts, and the hunters of the Calydonian boar. He was so swift and light that he could run over the sea without scarce wetting his feet. Pindar. Pyth. 4.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Paus. 5, c. 17.

Euphorbus. Vid. Part II.

Euphrosyna. Vid. Charites.

Eurōpa, a daughter of Agenor, king of Phœnicia and Telephassa. Jupiter became enamoured of her, and, assuming the shape of a bull, mingled with the herds of Agenor, while Europa, with her female attendants, were gathering flowers in the meadows. Europa caressed the beautiful animal, and at last had the courage to sit upon his back. The god took advantage of her situation, and with precipitate steps retired towards the shore, and crossed the sea with Europa on his back, and arrived safe in Crete. She became the mother of Minos, Sarpedon, and Rhadamanthus. After this distinguished amour with Jupiter, she married Asterius, king of Crete. This monarch seeing himself without children by Europa, adopted the fruit of her amours with Jupiter, and always esteemed Minos, Sarpedon, and Rhadamanthus as his own children. Some suppose that Europa lived about 1552 years before the Christian era. Ovid. Met. 2, fab. 13.—Mosch. Idyl.—Apollod. 2, c. 5, l. 3, c. 1. Vid. Part I.

Eurōtas, a son of Lelex, father to Sparta, who married Lacedæmon. He was one of the first kings of Laconia, and gave his name to the river which flows near Sparta. Apollod. 3, c. 16.—Paus. 3, c. 1. Vid. Part I.

Eurȳalus. Vid. Nisus, Part II.

Eurybiades, a Spartan, general of the Grecian fleet at the battles of Artemisium and Salamis against Xerxes. He has been charged with want of courage, and with ambition. He offered to strike Themistocles when he wished to speak about the manner of attacking the Persians, upon which the Athenian said, Strike me, but hear me. Herodot. 8, c. 2, 74, &c.—Plut. in Them.—C. Nep. in Them.

Eurycleia, a beautiful daughter of Ops of Ithaca. Laertes bought her for 20 oxen, and gave her his son Ulysses to nurse, and treated her with much tenderness and attention. Homer. Od. 19.

Eurydice. Vid. Orpheus, and Part II.

Eurȳlochus, one of the companions of Ulysses, the only one who did not taste the potions of Circe. His prudence, however, forsook him in Sicily, where he carried away the flocks sacred to Apollo, for which sacrilegious crime he was shipwrecked. Homer. Od. 10, v. 205, l. 12, v. 195.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 287.

Eurynōmus, one of the deities of hell. Paus. 10, c. 28.

Eurystheus, a king of Argos and Mycenæ, son of Sthenelus and Nicippe, the daughter of Pelops. Juno hastened his birth by two months, that he might come into the world before Hercules, the son of Alcmena, as the younger of the two was doomed, by order of Jupiter, to be subservient to the will of the other. Vid. Alcmena. This natural right was cruelly exercised by Eurystheus, who was jealous of the fame of Hercules; and who, to destroy so powerful a relation, imposed upon him the most dangerous and uncommon enterprises, well known by the name of the twelve labours of Hercules. The success of Hercules in achieving those perilous labours alarmed Eurystheus in a greater degree, and he furnished himself with a brazen vessel, where he might secure himself a safe retreat in case of danger. After the death of Hercules, Eurystheus renewed his cruelties against his children, and made war against Ceyx, king of Trachinia, because he had given them support and treated them with hospitality. He was killed in the prosecution of this war by Hyllus, the son of Hercules. His head was sent to Alemena, the mother of Hercules, who, mindful of the cruelties which her son had suffered, insulted it, and tore out the eyes with the most inveterate fury. Eurystheus was succeeded on the throne of Argos by Atreus, his nephew. Hygin. fab. 30 and 32.—Apollod. 2, c. 4, &c.—Paus. 1, c. 33, l. 3, c. 6.—Ovid. Met. 9, fab. 6.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 292.

Eurythion, and Eurytion, a centaur whose insolence to Hippodamia was the cause of the quarrel between the Lapithæ and Centaurs at the nuptials of Pyrithous. Ovid. Met. 12.—Paus. 5, c. 10.—Hesiod. Theog.

Eurytus, (idos,) a patronymic of Iole, daughter of Eurytus. Ovid. Met. 9, fab. 11.

Eurytus, a king of Œchalia, father to Iole. He offered his daughter to him who shot a bow better than himself. Hercules conquered him, and put him to death because he refused him his daughter as the prize of his victory. Apollod. 2, c. 4 and 7.

Euterpe, one of the Muses, daughter to Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over music, and was looked upon as the inventress of the flute and of all wind instruments. She is represented as crowned with flowers, and holding a flute in her hand. Some mythologists attributed to her the invention of tragedy, more commonly supposed to be the production of Melpomene. Vid. Musæ.

F.

Fama, (fame,) was worshipped by the ancients as a powerful goddess, and generally represented blowing a trumpet, &c.

Faunā, a deity among the Romans, daughter of Picus, and originally called Marica. Her marriage with Faunus procured her the name of Fauna, and her knowledge of futurity that of Fatua and Fatidica. It is said that she never saw a man after her marriage with Faunus, and that her uncommon chastity occasioned her being ranked among the gods after death. She is the same, according to some, as Bona Mater. Some mythologists accuse her of drunkenness, and say that she expired under the blows of her husband, for an immoderate use of wine. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 47, &c.—Varro.—Justin. 43, c. 1.

Fauni, certain rural deities, inhabiting, for the most part, the fields, and having the human figure, but with pointed ears and with the tail of a goat. They formed always a part of the train of Bacchus, together with the Sylvani and Satyrs. Visc. Mus. Pio. Clem. The peasants offered them a lamb or a kid with great solemnity. Virg. G. 1, v. 10.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 392.

Faunus, a son of Picus, who is said to have reigned in Italy about 1300 years B. C. His bravery as well as wisdom have given rise to the tradition that he was son of Mars. He raised a temple in honour of the god Pan, called, by the Latins, Lupercus, at the foot of the Palatine hill, and he exercised hospitality towards strangers with a liberal hand. His great popularity, and his fondness for agriculture, made his subjects revere him as one of their country deities after death. He was represented with all the equipage of the satyrs, and was consulted to give oracles. Dionys. 1, c. 7.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 47, l. 8, v. 314, l. 10, v. 55.—Horat. 1, od. 17.

Faustulus. Vid. Part II.

Februus, a god at Rome, who presided over purifications, sometimes considered to be the father of Pluto, but by most mythologists thought to be Pluto himself.

Feretrius, a surname of Jupiter, in which he received the dedication of the Spolia opima. Romulus, who first consecrated to him these Spolia, built a temple to Jupiter Feretrius, which was enlarged by Ancus Martius, and restored, at the request of Atticus, by Augustus. Liv. 1, 10.—Plut. in Rom.—C. Nep. in Att.—Propert. 4, 9.

Feronia, a goddess worshipped in Italy. She presided over woods and groves, and her temple was common to the Latins and the Sabines. There the manumitted slaves received the testimonials of their enfranchisement. Some have supposed her to be Juno, and others call her the mother of Herilus, who was slain by Evander. The name is derived a ferendo, because she gave assistance to her votaries, or perhaps from the town Feronia, near mount Soracte, where she had a temple. It was usual to make a yearly sacrifice to her, and to wash the face and hands in the waters of the sacred fountain which flowed near her temple. It is said that those who were filled with the spirit of this goddess could walk barefooted over burning coals without receiving any injury from the flames. The goddess had a temple and a grove about three miles from Anxur, and also another in the district of Capena. Liv. 33, c. 26.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 697 and 800.—Varro. de L. L. 4, c. 10.—Rel. 13.—Strab. 5.—Horat. 1. Sat. 5, v. 24.

Fides, the goddess of faith, oaths, and honesty, worshipped by the Romans. Numa was the first who paid her divine honours.

Fidius Dius, a divinity by whom the Romans generally swore. He was also called Sancus or Sanctus and Semipater, and he was solemnly addressed in prayers the 5th of June, which was yearly consecrated to his service. Some suppose him to be Hercules. Ov. Fast. 6, v. 213.—Var. de L. L. 4, c. 10.—Dion. Hal. 2 and 9.

Flora, the goddess of flowers and gardens among the Romans, the same as the Chloris of the Greeks. Some suppose that she was originally a common courtesan, who left to the Romans the immense riches which she had acquired by prostitution and lasciviousness, in remembrance of which a yearly festival was instituted in her honour. She was worshipped even among the Sabines, long before the foundation of Rome, and likewise among the Phoceans, who built Marseilles long before the existence of the capital of Italy. Tatius was the first who raised her a temple in the city of Rome. It is said that she married Zephyrus, and that she received from him the privileges of presiding over flowers, and of enjoying perpetual youth. Vid. Floralia. She was represented as crowned with flowers, and holding in her hand the horn of plenty. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 195, &c.—Varro de R. R. 1.—Lactant. 1, c. 20.

Fŏrnax, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the baking of bread. Her festivals, called Fornacalia, were first instituted by Numa. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 525.

Fortūna, a powerful deity among the ancients, daughter of Oceanus, according to Homer, or one of the Parcæ, according to Pindar. She was the goddess of fortune, and from her hand were derived riches and poverty, pleasures and misfortunes, blessings and pains. She was worshipped in different parts of Greece, and in Achaia; her statue held the horn of plenty in one hand, and had a winged Cupid at its feet. In Bœotia she had a statue which represented her as holding Plutus, the god of riches, in her arms, to intimate that fortune is the source whence wealth and honours flow. The Romans paid particular attention to the goddess of Fortune, and had no less than eight temples erected to her honour in their city. Tullus Hostilius was the first who built her a temple, and from that circumstance it is easily known when her worship was first introduced among the Romans. Her most famous temples in Italy was at Antium, in Latium, where presents and offerings were regularly sent from every part of the country. Fortune has been called Pherepolis, the protectress of cities, Acrea, from the temple of Corinth on an eminence, ακρος. She was called Prenestine at Præneste, in Italy, where she had also a temple. Besides she was worshipped among the Romans under different names, such as Female fortune, Virile fortune, Equestrian, Evil, Peaceful, Virgin, &c. On the 1st of April, which was consecrated to Venus among the Romans, the Italian widows and marriageable virgins assembled in the temple of Virile fortune, and, after burning incense and stripping themselves of their garments, they entreated the goddess to hide from the eyes of their husbands whatever defects there might be on their bodies. The goddess of fortune is represented on ancient monuments with a horn of plenty, and sometimes two, in her hands. She is blindfolded, and generally holds a wheel in her hand as an emblem of her inconstancy Sometimes she appears with wings, and treads upon the prow of a ship, and holds a rudder in her hand. Dionys. Hal. 4.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 569. Plut. de fort. Rom. and in Cor.—Cic. de Div. 2.—Liv. 10.—Augustin. de Civ. D. 4.—Flor. 1.—Val. Max. 1, c. 5.—Lucan. 2, &c.

Fraus, a divinity worshipped among the Romans, daughter of Orcus and Night. She presided over treachery, &c.

Fulgora, a goddess at Rome who presided over lightning. She was addressed to save her votaries from the effects of violent storms of thunder. Aug. de Civ. D. 6, c. 10.

Furiæ, the three daughters of Nox and Acheron, or of Pluto and Proserpine, according to some. Vid Eumenides.

Furīna, the goddess of robbers, worshipped at Rome. Some say that she is the same as the Furies. Her festivals were called Furinalia. Cic. de Nat. 3. c. 8.—Varro. de L. L. 5, c. 3.

G.

Galanthis, a servant maid of Alcmena. When Juno resolved to retard the birth of Hercules, and hasten the labours of the wife of Sthenelus, she solicited the aid of Lucina, who immediately repaired to the house of Alcmena, and, in the form of an old woman, sat near the door and uttered some magical words, which served to prolong the labours of Alcmena. Alcmena had already passed some days in the most excruciating torments, when Galanthis ran out of the house, and with a countenance expressive of joy, informed the old woman that her mistress had just brought forth. Lucina, at the words, rose from her posture, and that instant Alcmena was safely delivered. The laugh which Galanthis raised upon this made Lucina suspect that she had been deceived. She seized Galanthis by the hair, and threw her on the ground; and while she attempted to resist, she was changed into a weazel. The Bœotians paid great veneration to the weazel, which, as they supposed, facilitated the labours of Alcmena. Ælian. H. Anim. 2.—Ov. Met. 9, fab. 6.

Galatæa, and Galathea, a sea-nymph, daughter of Nereus and Doris. She was passionately loved by the Cyclops Polyphemus, whom she treated with coldness and disdain; while Acis, a shepherd of Sicily, enjoyed her unbounded affection. The happiness of these two lovers was disturbed by the jealousy of the Cyclops, who crushed his rival to pieces with a piece of a broken rock while he sat in the bosom of Galatæa. Galatæa was inconsolable for the loss of Acis, and as she could not restore him to life, she changed him into a fountain. Ov. Met. 13. v. 789.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 103.

Gamelia, a surname of Juno, as Gamelius was of Jupiter, on account of their presiding over marriages. Vid. Part II.

Gănymēde, a goddess, better known by the name of Hebe. She was worshipped under this name in a temple at Philus, in Peloponnesus. Paus. 2, c. 13.

Gănymēdes, a beautiful youth of Phrygia, son of Tros, and brother to Ilus and Assaracus. According to Lucian, he was son of Dardanus. He was taken up to heaven by Jupiter as he was hunting, or rather tending his father's flocks on mount Ida, and he became the cupbearer of the gods in the place of Hebe. Some say that he was carried away by an eagle. He is generally represented sitting on the back of a flying eagle in the air. Paus. 5, c. 24.—Homer. Il. 20, v. 231.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 252.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 155.—Horat. 4, od. 4. The fable of the rape of Ganymedes has given occasion to much remark in its interpretation, but it seems that we may easily interpret it, as so many other acts of violence committed in those ages, when piracy was no dishonest occupation, have been interpreted, and Ganymedes may have been but the captive of some powerful prince, or pirate, most probably Tantalus, king of Lydia. At all events, it can hardly be necessary, as certain learned writers of the present day have done, to assure the reader that Jupiter did not carry off the young Trojan, and that Ganymede's pouring out wine to the gods is a fable.

Gărămas, a king of Libya, whose daughter was mother of Ammon by Jupiter.

Gelănor, a king of Argos, who succeeded his father, and was deprived of his kingdom by Danaus the Egyptian. Paus. 2, c. 16. Vid. Danaus.

Gemini, a sign of the zodiac, which represents Castor and Pollux, the twin sons of Leda.

Genius. Vid. Dæmon.

Geryon, and Geryŏnes, a celebrated monster, born from the union of Chrysaor with Callirhoe, and represented by the poets as having three bodies and three heads. He lived in the island of Gades, where he kept numerous flocks, which were guarded by a two-headed dog, called Orthos, and by Eurythion. Hercules, by order of Eurystheus, went to Gades, and destroyed Geryon, Orthos, and Eurythion, and carried away all his flocks and herds to Tirynthus. Hesiod. Theog. 187.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 661, l. 8, v. 202.—Ital. 1, v. 277.—Apollod. 2.—Lucret. 5, v. 28.

Gigantes, the sons of Cœlus and Terra, who, according to Hesiod, sprang from the blood of the wound which Cœlus received from his son Saturn; whilst Hyginus calls them sons of Tartarus and Terra. They are represented as men of uncommon stature, with strength proportioned to their gigantic size. Some of them, as Cottus, Briareus, and Gyges, had 50 heads and 100 arms, and serpents instead of legs. They were of a terrible aspect, their hair hung loose about their shoulders, and their beard was suffered to grow untouched. Pallene and its neighbourhood was the place of their residence. The defeat of the Titans, with whom they are often ignorantly confounded, and to whom they were nearly related, incensed them against Jupiter, and they all conspired to dethrone him. The god was alarmed, and called all the deities to assist him against a powerful enemy, who made use of rocks, oaks, and burning woods for their weapons, and who had already heaped mount Ossa upon Pelion, to scale with more facility the walls of heaven. At the sight of such dreadful adversaries, the gods fled with the greatest consternation into Egypt, where they assumed the shape of different animals to screen themselves from their pursuers. Jupiter, however, remembered that they were not invincible, provided he called a mortal to his assistance; and, by the advice of Pallas, he armed his son Hercules in his cause. With the aid of this celebrated hero, the giants were soon put to flight and defeated. Some were crushed to pieces under mountains or buried in the sea; and others were flayed alive, or beaten to death with clubs. Vid. Enceladus, Aloides, Porphyrion, Typhon, Otus, Titanes, &c. The existence of giants has been supported by all the writers of antiquity, and received as an undeniable truth. Homer tells us, that Tityus, when extended on the ground, covered nine acres; and that Polyphemus eat two of the companions of Ulysses at once, and walked along the shores of Sicily, leaning on a staff which might have served for the mast of a ship. The Grecian heroes, during the Trojan war, and Turnus in Italy, attacked their enemies by throwing stones, which four men of the succeeding ages would be unable to move. Plutarch also mentions, in support of their gigantic stature, that Sertorius opened the grave of Antæus in Africa, and found a skeleton which measured six cubits in length. Apollod. 1, c. 6.—Paus. 8, c. 2, &c.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 151.—Plut. in Sertor.—Hygin. fab. 28, &c.—Homer. Od. 7 and 10.—Virg G. 1, v. 280. Æn. 6, v. 580. If the accounts of the giants be not, with other portions of the heathen mythology, an unfounded fable, they probably relate to some physical phenomena, or to some of the early convulsions of nature; in like manner as the mysteries of the worship of Osiris and Isis are supposed to have concealed, in the adventures of those deities, the laws and relations of the heavenly bodies, and their influence on the fertilizing inundations of the Nile.

Glaucus, I. a son of Hippolochus, the son of Bellerophon. He assisted Priam in the Trojan war, and had the simplicity to exchange his golden suit of armour with Diomedes for an iron one, whence came the proverb of Glauci et Diomedes permutatio, to express a foolish purchase. He behaved with much courage and was killed by Ajax. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 483.—Martial. 9, ep. 96.—Homer. Il. 6.——II. A fisherman of Anthedon, in Bœotia, son of Neptune and Nais, or, according to others, of Polybius, the son of Mercury. As he was fishing, he observed that all the fishes which he laid on the grass received fresh vigour as they touched the ground, and immediately escaped from him by leaping into the sea. He attributed the cause of it to the grass, and, by tasting it, he found himself suddenly moved with a desire of living in the sea. Upon this he leaped into the water, and was made a sea deity by Oceanus and Tethus, at the request of the gods. After this transformation he became enamoured of the Nereid Scylla, whose ingratitude was severely punished by Circe. *Vid. Scylla. Ovid. A son of Sisyphus, king of Corinth, by Merope, the daughter of Atlas, born at Potnia, a village of Bœotia. His mares tore his body to pieces as he returned from the games which Adrastus had celebrated in honour of his father. He was buried at Potnia. Hygin. fab. 250.—Virg. G. 3, v. 367.—Apollod. 1 and 2.——IV. A son of Minos the 2d, and Pasiphae, who was smothered in a cask of honey. Minos confined the soothsayer Polyidus with the dead body, and told him that he never would restore him his liberty if he did not restore it to life. Polyidus was struck with the king's severity, but while he stood in astonishment, a serpent suddenly came towards the body and touched it. Polyidus killed the serpent, and immediately a second came, who seeing the other without motion or signs of life, disappeared, and soon after returned with a certain herb in his mouth. This herb he laid on the body of the dead serpent, who was immediately restored to life. Polyidus, who had attentively considered what passed, seized the herb, and with it rubbed the body of the dead prince, who was instantly raised to life. Minos received Glaucus with gratitude, but he refused to restore Polyidus to liberty before he taught his son the art of divination and prophecy. He consented with great reluctance, and when he was at last permitted to return to Argolis, his native country, he desired his pupil to spit in his mouth.

Glaucus consented, and from that moment he forgot all the knowledge of divination and healing which he had received from the instruction of Polyidus. Hyginus ascribes the recovery of Glaucus to Æsculapius. Apollod. 2, c. 3.—Hygin. 136 and 251, &c.——V. A son of Epytus, who succeeded his father on the throne of Messenia, about 10 centuries before the Augustan age. He introduced the worship of Jupiter among the Dorians, and was the first who offered sacrifices to Machaon, the son of Æsculapius. Paus. 4, c. 3. Vid. Part I.

Gnossis, and Gnossia, an epithet given to Ariadne, because she lived, or was born at Gnossus. The crown which she received from Bacchus, and which was made a constellation, is called Gnossia Stella. Virg. G. 1, v. 222.

Goniades, nymphs in the neighbourhood of the river Cytherus. Strab. 8.

Gordius. Vid. Part II.

Gorgo, the name of the ship which carried Perseus, after he had conquered Medusa. Vid. Part II.

Gorgones, three celebrated sisters, daughters of Phorcys and Ceto, whose names were Stheno, Euryale, and Medusa, all immortal except Medusa. According to the mythologists, their hairs were entwined with serpents, their hands were of brass, their wings of the colour of gold, their body was covered with impenetrable scales, and their teeth were as long as the tusks of a wild boar, and they turned to stones all those on whom they fixed their eyes. Medusa alone had serpents in her hair, according to Ovid, and this proceeded from the resentment of Minerva, in whose temple Medusa had gratified the passion of Neptune, who was enamoured of the beautiful colour of her locks, which the goddess changed into serpents. According to some authors, Perseus, when he went to the conquest of the Gorgons, was armed with an instrument like a scythe by Mercury, and provided with a looking-glass by Minerva, besides winged shoes, and a helmet of Pluto, which rendered all objects clearly visible and open to the view, while the person who wore it remained totally invisible. With weapons like these Perseus obtained an easy victory; and after his conquest returned his arms to the different deities whose favours and assistance he had so recently experienced. The head of Medusa remained in his hands; and after he had finished all his laborious expeditions, he gave it to Minerva, who placed it on her ægis, with which she turned into stones all such as fixed their eyes upon it. It is said, that after the conquest of the Gorgons, Pertheus took his flight in the air towards Æthiopia; and that the drops of blood which fell to the ground from Medusa's head were changed into serpents, which have ever since infested the sandy deserts of Libya. The horse Pegasus also arose from the blood of Medusa, as well as Chrysaor with his golden sword. The residence of the Gorgons was beyond the ocean towards the west, according to Hesiod. Æschylus makes them inhabit the eastern parts of Scythia; and Ovid, as the most received opinion, supports that they lived in the inland parts of Libya, near the lake of Triton or the gardens of the Hesperides. Diodorus and others explain the fable of the Gorgons, by supposing that they were a warlike race of women near the Amazons, whom Perseus, with the help of a large army, totally destroyed. *Hesiod. Gorgonia, a surname of Pallas, because Perseus, armed with her shield, had conquered the Gorgon who had polluted her temple with Neptune.

Gorgophone, a daughter of Perseus and Andromeda, who married Perieres, king of Messenia, by whom she had Aphareus and Leucippus. After the death of Perieres, she married Œbalus, who made her mother of Icarus and Tyndarus. She is the first whom the mythologists mention as having had a second husband. Paus. 4, c. 2.—Apollod. 1, 2 and 3.

Gradivus, a surname of Mars among the Romans, perhaps from κραδαινειν, brandishing a spear. Though he had a temple without the walls of Rome, and though Numa had established the Salii, yet his favourite residence was supposed to be among the fierce and savage Thracians and Getæ, over whom he particularly presided. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 35.—Homer. Il.—Liv. 1, c. 20, l. 2, c. 45.

Gratiæ. Vid. Charites.

Gyges, or Gyes, a son of Cœlus and Terra, represented as having 50 heads and a hundred hands. He, with his brothers, made war against the gods, and was afterwards punished in Tartarus. Vid. Part II. Ovid. Trist. 4, el. 7, v. 18.

Gynæcothœnas, a name of Mars at Tegea, on account of a sacrifice offered by the women without the assistance of the men, who were not permitted to appear at this religious ceremony. Paus. 8, c. 48.

H

Hades, or Ades, a name given to Pluto; also to the infernal regions.

Hæmon, a Theban youth, son of Creon, who was so captivated with the beauty of Antigone, that he killed himself on her tomb when he heard that she had been put to death by his father's orders. Propert. 2, el. 8, v. 21.

Halæsus, and Halesus, a son of Agamemnon by Briseis or Clytemnestra. When he was driven from home he came to Italy, and settled on mount Massicus in Campania, where he built Falisci, and afterwards assisted Turnus against Æneas. He was killed by Pallas. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 724, l. 10, v. 352.

Halirrhotius, a son of Neptune and Euryte, who ravished Alcippe, daughter of Mars, because she slighted his addresses. This violence offended Mars, and he killed the ravisher. Neptune cited Mars to appear before the tribunal of justice to answer for the murder of his son. The cause was tried at Athens, in a place which has been called from thence Areopagus, (αρης, Mars. and παγος, village,) and the murderer was acquitted. Apollod. 3, c. 14.—Paus. 1, c. 21.

Hamadryades. This word is derived from αμα simul, and δρυς quercus. Virg. Ecl. 10.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 647. Vid. Dryades.

Hammon, or Ammon, a surname of Jupiter in Libya. It is related that Bacchus, being on the point of dying with thirst, when traversing the Libyan deserts, invoked the aid of Jupiter. Thereupon a ram appeared, and, stamping out the ground, opened a spring in the sand. This ram he acknowledged to be Jupiter, and therefore built a temple to him, giving him the appellation of Ammon, or the Sandy. This temple was situated in the Oasis of Siwah. Alexander the Great, upon visiting it, was declared by the priests a son of the deity. Vid. Part I. Millin.

Harcălo, a man famous for his knowledge of poisonous herbs, &c. He touched the most venomous serpents and reptiles without receiving the smallest injury. Sil. 1, v. 406.

Harmŏnia, or Hermione, (Vid. Hermione,) a daughter of Mars and Venus, who married Cadmus. It is said that Vulcan, to avenge the infidelity of her mother, made her a present of a vestment died in all sorts of crimes, which in some measure inspired all the children of Cadmus with wickedness and impiety. Paus. 9, c. 16, &c.

Harmŏnides, a Trojan beloved by Minerva. He built the ships in which Paris carried away Helen. Homer. Il. 5.

Harpălion, a son of Pylæmenes king of Paphlagonia, who assisted Priam during the Trojan war, and was killed by Merion. Homer. Il. 13, v. 643.

Harpalyce, I. the daughter of Harpalycus, king of Thrace. Her mother died when she was but a child, and her father fed her with the milk of cows and mares, and inured her early to sustain the fatigues of hunting. When her father's kingdom was invaded by Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles, she repelled and defeated the enemy with manly courage. The death of her father, which happened soon after in a sedition, rendered her disconsolate; she fled the society of mankind, and lived in the forests upon plunder and rapine. Every attempt to secure her proved fruitless, till her great swiftness was overcome by intercepting her with a net. After death the people of the country disputed their respective rights to the possessions which she acquired by rapine, and they soon after appeased her manes by proper oblations on her tomb. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 321.—Hygin. fab. 163 and 252.——II. A mistress of Iphiclus, son of Thestius. She died through despair on seeing herself despised by her lover. This mournful story was composed in poetry, in the form of a dialogue called Harpalyce. Athen. 14.

Harpŏcrates, a divinity supposed to be the same as Orus, the son of Isis, among the Egyptians. He is represented as holding one of his fingers on his mouth, and from thence he is called the god of silence, and intimates that the mysteries of religion and philosophy ought never to be revealed to the people. The Romans placed his statues at the entrance of their temples. Catull. 75.—Varro. de L. L. 4, c. 10.

Harpўiæ, winged monsters, who had the face of a woman, the body of a vulture, and had their feet and fingers armed with sharp claws. They were three in number, Aello, Ocypete, and Celeno, daughters of Neptune and Terra. They were sent by Juno to plunder the tables of Phineus, whence they were driven to the islands called Strophades by Zethes and Calais. They emitted an infectious smell, and spoiled whatever they touched by their filth and excrements. They plundered Æneas during his voyage towards Italy, and predicted many of the calamities which attended him. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 212, l. 6, v. 289.—Hesiod. Theog. 265.

Hebe, the daughter of Jupiter and Juno. As she was fair, and always in the bloom of youth, she was called the goddess of youth, and made by her mother cup-bearer to all the gods. She was dismissed from her office by Jupiter, and Ganymedes, his favourite, succeeded her as cup-bearer. She was employed by her mother to prepare her chariot, and to harness her peacocks whenever requisite. When Hercules was raised to the rank of a god, he was reconciled to Juno by marrying her daughter Hebe, by whom he had two sons, Alexiaris and Anicetus. As Hebe had the power of restoring gods and men to the vigour of youth, she, at the instance of her husband, performed that kind office to Iolas his friend. Hebe was worshipped at Sicyon, under the name of Dia, and at Rome under the name of Juventas. She is represented as a young virgin crowned with flowers, and arrayed in a variegated garment. Paus. 1, c. 19, l. 2, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 400. Fast. 9, v. 76.—Apollod. 1, c. 3, l. 2, c. 7.

Hecăte, a daughter of Perses and Asteria, the same as Proserpine or Diana. She was called Luna in heaven, Diana on earth, and Hecate or Proserpine in hell, whence her name of Diva triformis, tergemina, triceps. She was supposed to preside over magic and enchantments, and was generally represented like a woman with three heads, that of a horse, a dog, or a boar; and sometimes she appeared with three different bodies, and three different faces, only with one neck. Dogs, lambs, and honey, were generally offered to her, especially in high ways and cross roads, whence she obtained the name of Trivia. Her power was extended over heaven, the earth, sea, and hell; and to her kings and nations supposed themselves indebted for their prosperity. Ovid. 7, Met. v. 94.—Hesiod. Theog.—Horat. 3, od. 22.—Paus. 2, c. 22.—Virg Æn. 4, v. 511.

Hĕlĕnus. Vid. Part II.

Heliades, the daughters of the Sun and Clymene. They were three in number, Lampetie, Phaetusa, and Lampethusa; or seven, according to Hygin: Merope, Helie, Ægle, Lampetie, Phœbe, Ætheria, and Dioxippe. They were so afflicted at the death of their brother Phæton, (Vid. Phæton,) that they were changed by the gods into poplars, and their tears into precious amber, on the banks of the river Po. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 340.—Hygin. fab. 154.

Helicion. Vid. Part II.

Hĕlice, a star near the north pole, generally called Ursa Major. It is supposed to receive its name from the town of Helice, of which Calisto, who was changed into the Great Bear, was an inhabitant. Lucan. 2, v. 237.

Hĕlĭcōnĭades, a name given to the Muses, because they lived upon mount Helicon, which was sacred to them.

Helle. Vid. Argonautæ.

Hellen, son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, reigned in Phthiotis about 1495 years before the Christian era, and gave the name of Helenians to his subjects. He had, by his wife Orseis, three sons; Æolius, Dorus, and Xuthus, who gave their names to the three different nations, known under the name of Æolians, Dorians, and Ionians. These last derive their name from Ion, son of Xuthus, and from the difference, either of expression or pronunciation, in their respective languages, arose the different dialects well known in the Greek language. Paus. 3, c. 20, l. 7, c. 1.—Diod. 5.

HEMATHION, a son of Aurora and Cephalus, or Tithonus. Apollod. 3.

HEMITHEA, a daughter of Cycnus and Proclea. She was so attached to her brother Tenes, that she refused to abandon him when his father Cycnus exposed him on the sea. They were carried by the wind to Tenedos, where Hemithea long enjoyed tranquillity, till Achilles, captivated by her charms, offered her violence. She was rescued from his embrace by her brother Tenes, who was instantly slaughtered by the offended hero. Hemithea could not have been rescued from the attempts of Achilles, had not the earth opened and swallowed her after she had fervently entreated the assistance of the gods. Vid. Tenes. Paus. 10, c. 14.—Diod. 4.

HERA, the name of Juno among the Greeks.

HERCÆUS, an epithet given to Jupiter. Ovid. Ib. 286.—Lucan. 9, v. 979.

HERCULES, a celebrated hero, who, after death, was ranked among the gods, and received divine honours. According to the ancients there were many persons of the same name. Diodorus mentions three, Cicero six, and some authors extend the number to no less than forty-three. Of all these the son of Jupiter and Alcmena, generally called the Theban, is the most celebrated, and to him, as may easily be imagined, the actions of the others have been attributed. Hercules was brought up at Tirynthus; or, according to Diodorus, at Thebes, and before he had completed his eighth month, the jealousy of Juno, intent upon his destruction, sent two snakes to devour him. The child, not terrified by the sight of the serpents, boldly seized them in both his hands and squeezed them to death, while his brother Iphiclus alarmed the house with his frightful shrieks. Vid Iphiclus. He was early instructed in the liberal arts, and Castor, the son of Tyndarus, taught him how to fight, Eurytus how to shoot with a bow and arrows, Autolycus to drive a chariot, Linus to play on the lyre, and Eumolpus to sing. He, like the rest of his illustrious contemporaries, soon after became the pupil of the centaur Chiron, and under him he perfected and rendered himself the most valiant and accomplished of the age. In the 18th year of his age he resolved to deliver the neighbourhood of mount Cithæron from a huge lion which preyed on the flocks of Amphitryon, his supposed father, and which laid waste the adjacent country. He went to the court of Thespius, king of Thespis, who shared in the general calamity, and he received there a tender treatment, and was entertained during fifty days. The fifty daughters of the king became all mothers by Hercules during his stay at Thespis. After he had destroyed the lion of mount Cithæron, he delivered his country from the annual tribute of a hundred oxen which it paid to Erginus. Vid. Ergimus. Such public services became universally known, and Creon, who then sat on the throne of Thebes, rewarded the patriotic deeds of Hercules by giving him his daughter in marriage, and intrusting him with the government of his kingdom. As Hercules, by the will of Jupiter, was subjected to the power of Eurystheus, (Vid Eurystheus,) and obliged to obey him in every respect, Eurystheus, acquainted with his successes and rising power, ordered him to appear at Mycenæ and perform the labours which, by priority of birth, he was empowered to impose upon him. Hercules refused, and Juno, to punish his disobedience, rendered him so delirious that he killed his own children by Megara, supposing them to be the offspring of Eurystheus. Vid Megara. When he recovered the use of his senses, he was so struck with the misfortunes which had proceeded from his insanity, that he concealed himself, and retired from the society of men for some time. He afterwards consulted the oracle of Apollo, and was told that he must be subservient for twelve years to the will of Eurystheus, in compliance with the commands of Jupiter; and that after he had achieved the most celebrated labours, he should be reckoned in the number of the gods. So plain and expressive an answer determined him to go to Mycenæ, and to bear with fortitude whatever gods or men imposed upon him. Eurystheus seeing so great a man totally subjected to him, and apprehensive of so powerful an enemy, commanded him to achieve a number of enterprises, the most difficult and arduous ever known, generally called the 12 labours of Hercules. The favours of the gods had completely armed him when he undertook his labours. He had received a coat of arms and helmet from Minerva, a sword from Mercury, a horse from Neptune, a shield from Jupiter, a bow and arrows from Apollo, and from Vulcan a golden cuiras and brazen buskin, with a celebrated club of brass, according to the opinion of some writers, but more generally supposed to be of wood, and cut by the hero himself in the forest of Nemæa.——The first labour imposed upon Hercules by Eurystheus, was to kill the lion of Nemæa, which ravaged the country near Mycenæ. The hero, unable to destroy him with his arrows, boldly attacked him with his club, pursued him to his den, and after a close and sharp engagement he choked him to death. He carried the dead beast on his shoulders to Mycenæ, and ever after clothed himself with the skin. Eurystheus was so astonished at the sight of the beast, and at the courage of Hercules, that he ordered him never to enter the gates of the city when he returned from his expeditions, but to wait for his orders without the walls. He even made himself a brazen vessel, into which he retired whenever Hercules returned.——The second labour of Hercules was to destroy the Lernæan hydra, which had seven heads according to Apollodorus, 50 according to Simonides, and 100 according to Diodorus. This celebrated monster he attacked with his arrows, and soon after he came to a close engagement, and by means of his heavy club he destroyed the heads of his enemy. But this was productive of no advantage; for as soon as one head was beaten to pieces by the club, immediately two sprang up, and the labour of Hercules would have remained unfinished had not he commanded his friend Iolas to burn, with a hot iron, the root of the head which he had crushed to pieces. This succeeded, (Vid. Hydra,) and Hercules became victorious, opened the belly of the monster, and dipped his arrows in the gall to render the wounds which he gave fatal and incurable.——He was ordered in his third labour to bring alive and unhurt into the presence of Eurystheus a stag, famous for its incredible swiftness, its golden horns, and brazen feet. This celebrated animal frequented the neighbourhood of Œnoe, and Hercules was employed for a whole year in continually pursuing it, and at last he caught it in a trap, or when tired, or, according to others, by slightly wounding it and lessening its swiftness. As he returned victorious, Diana snatched the goat from him, and severely reprimanded him for molesting an animal which was sacred to her. Hercules pleaded necessity, and by representing the commands of Eurystheus, he appeased the goddess and obtained the beast.——The fourth labour was to bring alive to Eurystheus a wild boar which ravaged the neighbourhood of Erymanthus. In this expedition he destroyed the centaurs, (Vid. Centauri,) and caught the boar by closely pursuing him through the deep snow. Eurystheus was so frightened at the sight of the boar, that, according to Diodorus, he hid himself in his brazen vessel for some days.——In his fifth labour Hercules was ordered to clean the stables of Augias, where 3000 oxen had been confined for many years. Vid. Augias.——For his sixth labour he was ordered to kill the carnivorous birds which ravaged the country near the lake Stymphalis in Arcadia. Vid. Stymphalis.——In his seventh labour he brought alive into Peloponnesus, a prodigious wild bull which laid waste the island of Crete.——In his eighth labour he was employed in obtaining the mares of Diomedes, which fed upon human flesh. He killed Diomedes, and gave him to be eaten by his mares, which he brought to Eurystheus. They were sent to mount Olympus by the king of Mycenæ, where they were devoured by the wild beasts; or, according to others, they were consecrated to Jupiter, and their breed still existed in the age of Alexander the Great.——For his ninth labour he was commanded to obtain the girdle of the queen of the Amazons. Vid. Hippolite.——In his tenth labour he killed the monster Geryon, king of Gades, and brought to Argos his numerous flocks which fed upon human flesh. Vid. Geryon.——The eleventh labour was to obtain apples from the garden of the Hesperides. Vid. Hesperides.——The twelfth and last, and most dangerous of his labours, was to bring upon the earth the three-headed dog Cerberus. This was cheerfully undertaken by Hercules, and he descended into hell by a cave on mount Tænarus. He was permitted by Pluto to carry away his friends Theseus and Pirithous, who were condemned to punishment in hell; and Cerberus also was granted to his prayers, provided he made use of no arms, but only force, to drag him away. Hercules, as some report, carried him back to hell after he had brought him before Eurystheus. Besides these arduous labours, which the jealousy of Eurystheus imposed upon him, he also achieved others of his own accord, equally great and celebrated. Vid. Cacus, Antæus, Busiris, Eryx, &c. He accompanied the Argonauts to Colchis before he delivered himself up to the king of Mycenæ. He assisted the gods in their wars against the giants, and it was through him alone that Jupiter obtained a victory. Vid. Gigantes. He conquered Laomedon, and pillaged Troy. Vid. Laomedon. When Iole, the daughter of Eurytus, king of Œchalia, of whom he was deeply enamoured, was refused to his entreaties, he became the prey of a second fit of insanity, and he murdered Iphitus, the only one of the sons of Eurytus who favoured his addresses to Iole. Vid. Iphitus. He was some time after purified of the murder, and his insanity ceased; but the gods persecuted him more, and he was visited by a disorder which obliged him to apply to the oracle of Delphi for relief. The coldness with which the Pythia received him, irritated him, and he resolved to plunder Apollo's temple, and carry away the sacred tripod. Apollo opposed him, and a severe conflict was begun, which nothing but the interference of Jupiter with his thunderbolts could have prevented. He was upon this told by the oracle that he must be sold as a slave, and remain three years in the most abject servitude to recover from his disorder. He complied: and Mercury, by order of Jupiter, conducted him to Omphale, queen of Lydia, to whom he was sold as a slave. Here he cleared all the country from robbers; and Omphale, who was astonished at the greatness of his exploits, restored him to liberty, and married him. Hercules had Agelaus, and Lamon according to others, by Omphale, from whom Crœsus, king of Lydia, was descended. He became also enamoured of one of Omphale's female servants, by whom he had Alceus. After he had completed the years of his slavery, he returned to Peloponnesus, where he re-established on the throne of Sparta, Tyndarus, who had been expelled by Hippocoon. He became one of Dejanira's suiters, and married her, after he had overcome all his rivals. Vid. Achelous. He was obliged to leave Calydon, his father-in-law's kingdom, because he had inadvertently killed a man with a blow of his fist, and it was on account of this expulsion that he was not present at the hunting of the Calydonian boar. From Calydon he retired to the court of Ceyx, king of Trachinia. In his way he was stopped by the swollen streams of the Evenus, where the centaur Nessus attempted to offer violence to Dejanira, under the perfidious pretence of conveying her over the river. Hercules perceived the distress of Dejanira, and killed the centaur, who, as he expired, gave her a tunic, which, as he observed, had the power of recalling a husband from unlawful love. Vid. Dejanira. Ceyx, king of Trachinia, received him and his wife with great marks of friendship, and purified him of the murder he had committed at Calydon. Hercules was still mindful that he had once been refused the hand of Iole; he therefore made war against her father Eurytus, and killed him with three of his sons. Iole fell into the hands of her father's murderer, and found that she was loved by Hercules as much as before. She accompanied him to mount Œta, where he was going to raise an altar, and offer a solemn sacrifice to Jupiter. As he had not then the tunic in which he arrayed himself to offer a sacrifice, he sent Lichas to Dejanira in order to provide himself a proper dress. Dejanira, informed of her husband's tender attachment to Iole, sent him a filter, or more probably the tunic which she had received from Nessus, and Hercules, as soon as he had put it on, fell into a desperate distemper, and found the poison of the Lernæan hydra penetrate through his bones. He attempted to pull off the fatal dress, but it was too late; and in the midst of his pains and tortures he inveighed in the most bitter imprecations against the credulous Dejanira, the cruelty of Eurystheus, and the jealousy and hatred of Juno. As the distemper was incurable, he implored the protection of Jupiter, and gave his bow and arrows to Philoctetes, and erected a large burning pile on the top of mount Œta. He spread on the pile the skin of the Nemæan lion, and laid down upon it as on a bed, leaning his head on his club. Philoctetes, or, according to others, Pæan or Hyllus, was ordered to set fire to the pile, and the hero saw himself on a sudden surrounded with the flames, without betraying any marks of fear or astonishment. Jupiter saw him from heaven, and told the surrounding gods that he would raise to the skies the immortal parts of a hero who had cleared the earth from so many monsters and tyrants. The gods applauded Jupiter's resolution, the burning pile was suddenly surrounded with a dark smoke, and after the mortal parts of Hercules were consumed, he was carried up to heaven in a chariot drawn by four horses. Some loud claps of thunder accompanied his elevation, and his friends, unable to find either his bones or ashes, showed their gratitude to his memory by raising an altar where the burning pile had stood. Menœtius, the son of Actor, offered him a sacrifice of a bull, a wild boar, and a goat, and enjoined the people of Opus yearly to observe the same religious ceremonies. His worship soon became as universal as his fame; and Juno, who had once persecuted him with such inveterate fury, forgot her resentment, and gave him her daughter Hebe in marriage. Hercules has received many surnames and epithets, either from the place where his worship was established, or from the labours which he achieved. His temples were numerous and magnificent, and his divinity revered. The Phœnicians offered quails on his altars, and as it was supposed that he presided over dreams, the sick and infirm were sent to sleep in his temples, that they might receive in their dream the agreeable presages of their approaching recovery. The white poplar was particularly dedicated to his service. Hercules is generally represented naked, with strong and well-proportioned limbs; he is sometimes covered with the skin of the Nemæan lion, and holds a knotted club in his hand, on which he often leans. Diod. 1 and 4. —*Cic. de Nat. HERCYNA, a nymph who accompanied Ceres as she travelled over the world. A river in Bœotia bore her name. Paus. 9, c. 39.

HERĬLUS, a king of Prænestè, son of the nymph Feronia. As he had three lives, he was killed three times by Evander. Vir. Æn. 8, v. 563.

HERMAPHRŎDITUS, a son of Venus and Mercury, educated on mount Ida by the Naiades. At the age of 15 he began to travel to gratify his curiosity. When he came to Caira, he bathed himself in a fountain, and Salmacis, the nymph who presided over it, became enamoured of him, and attempted to seduce him. Hermaphroditus continued deaf to all entreaties and offers; and Salmacis endeavouring to obtain by force what was denied to prayers, closely embraced him, and entreated the gods to make them two but one body. Her prayers were heard, and Salmacis and Hermaphroditus, now two in one body, still preserved the characteristics of both their sexes. Hermaphroditus begged the gods that all who bathed in that fountain might become effeminate. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 347.—Hygin. fab. 271.

HERMES, the name of Mercury among the Greeks. Vid. Mercurius.

HERMIŎNE, a daughter of Mars and Venus, who married Cadmus. The gods, except Juno, honoured their nuptials with their presence, and she received as a present, a rich veil and a splendid necklace which had been made by Vulcan. She was changed into a serpent with her husband Cadmus, and placed in the Elysian fields. Vid. Harmonia. Apollod. 3.—Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 13. Vid. Parts I and II.

HEROES, the name which was given by the ancients to such as were born from a god, or to such as had signalized themselves by their actions, and seemed to deserve immortality by the service they had rendered their country. The heroes which Homer describes, such as Ajax, Achilles, &c. were of such prodigious strength, that they could lift up and throw stones which the united force of four or five men of his age could not have moved. The heroes were supposed to be interested in the affairs of mankind after death, and they were invoked with much solemnity. As the altars of the gods were crowded with sacrifices and libations, so the heroes were often honoured with a funeral solemnity, in which their great exploits were enumerated.

HERSE, a daughter of Cecrops, king of Athens, beloved by Mercury. The god disclosed his love to Aglauros, Herse's sister, in hopes of procuring an easy admission to Herse; but Aglauros, through jealousy, discovered the amour. Herse became mother of Cephalus by Mercury, and, after death, she received divine honours at Athens. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 559, &c.

HERTHA, and HERTA, a goddess among the Germans, supposed to be the same as the earth. She had a temple and a chariot dedicated to her service, in a remote island, and was supposed to visit the earth at stated times, when her coming was celebrated with the greatest rejoicings and festivity. Tacit. de Germ.

Hesiŏne, a daughter of Laomedon, king of Troy, by Strymo, the daughter of the Scamander. It fell to her lot to be exposed to a sea-monster, to whom the Trojans yearly presented a marriageable virgin, to appease the resentment of Apollo and Neptune, whom Laomedon had offended, but Hercules promised to deliver her, provided he received as a reward six beautiful horses. Laomedon consented, and Hercules attacked the monster just as he was going to devour Hesione, and he killed him with his club. Laomedon, however, refused to reward the hero's services; and Hercules, incensed at his treachery, besieged Troy, and put the king and all his family to the sword, except Podarces, or Priam, who had advised his father to give the promised horses to his sister's deliverer. The conqueror gave Hesione in marriage to his friend Telamon, who had assisted him during the war, and he established Priam upon his father's throne. Homer. Il. 5, v. 638.—Diod. 4. Apollod. 2, c. 5, &c.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 212.

Hesperĭdes, three celebrated nymphs, daughters of Hesperus. Apollodorus mentions four, Ægle, Erythia, Vesta, and Arethusa; and Diodorus confounds them with the Atlantides, and supposes that they were the same number. They were appointed to guard the golden apples which Juno gave to Jupiter on the day of their nuptials; and the place of their residence, placed beyond the ocean by Hesiod, is more universally believed to be near mount Atlas in Africa, according to Apollodorus. This celebrated place or garden abounded with fruits of the most delicious kind, and was carefully guarded by a dreadful dragon which never slept. It was one of the labours of Hercules to procure some of the golden apples of the Hesperides. These were brought to Eurystheus, and afterwards carried back by Minerva into the garden of the Hesperides, as they could be preserved in no other place. Hercules is sometimes represented gathering the apples, and the dragon, which guarded the tree, appears bowing down his head, as having received a mortal wound. This monster, as it is supposed, was the offspring of Typhon, and it had a hundred heads and as many voices. This number, however, is reduced by some to only one head. Those that attempt to explain mythology, observe that the Hesperides were certain persons who had an immense number of flocks; and that the ambiguous word μηλον, which signifies an apple, and a sheep, gave rise to the fable of the golden apples of the Hesperides. Diod. 4.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 637, &c. l. 9, v. 90.—Hygin. fab. 30.—Apol. 3, c. 5.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 215, &c.

Hesperus, I. a son of Japetus, brother to Atlas. He came to Italy, and the country received the name of Hesperia from him, according to some accounts. He had a daughter called Hesperis, who married Atlas, and became mother of seven daughters, called Atlantides or Hesperides. Diod. 4.——II. The name of Hesperus was also applied to the planet Venus, when it appeared after the setting of the sun. It was called Phosphorus or Lucifer when it preceded the sun. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 2.—Senec. de Hippol. 749. Id. in Med. 71.

Hesus, a deity among the Gauls, the same as the Mars of the Romans. Lucan. 1, v. 445.

Hiĕrax, a youth who awoke Argus to inform him that Mercury was stealing Io. Mercury killed him, and changed him into a bird of prey. Apollod. 2, c. 1. Vid. Part II.

Hilaria, a daughter of Leucippus and Philodice. As she and her sister Phœbe were going to marry their cousins Lynceus and Idas, they were carried away by Castor and Pollux, who married them. Hilaria had Anagon by Castor, and she, as well as her sister, obtained, after death, the honours which were generally paid to heroes. Apollod. 3.—Propert. 1, el. 2, v. 16.—Paus. 2, c. 22, l. 3, c. 19.

Hippius, a surname of Neptune, from his having raised a horse (ιππος) from the earth in his contest with Minerva, concerning the giving a name to Athens.

Hippocoon, a son of Œbalus, brother to Tyndarus. He was put to death by Hercules because he had driven his brother from the kingdom of Lacedæmon. He was at the chase of the Calydonian boar. Diod. 4.—Apollod. 2, &c. l. 3, c. 10.—Paus. Lacon.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 314.

Hippŏdāme, and Hippodamīa, I. a daughter of Œnomaus, king of Pisa, in Elis, who married Pelops, son of Tantalus. Her father refused to marry her, except to him who could overcome him in a chariot race. As the beauty of Hippodamia was greatly celebrated, many courted her, and accepted her father's conditions, though death attended a defeat. Thirteen had already been conquered, and forfeited their lives, when Pelops came from Lydia and entered the lists. He previously bribed Myrtilus, the charioteer of Œnomaus, and ensured himself the victory. Hippodamia became mother of Atreus and Thyestes, and it is said that she died of grief for the death of her father, which her guilty correspondence with Pelops and Myrtilus had occasioned. Virg. G. 3, v. 7.—Hygin. fab. 84 and 253.—Paus. 5, c. 14, &c.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. Heroid. 8 and 17. Vid. Œnomaus.—II. A daughter of Adrastus, king of Argos, who married Pirithous, king of the Lapithæ. The festivity which prevailed on the day of her marriage was interrupted by the attempts of Eurytus to offer her violence. Vid. Pirithous. She is called Ischomache by some, and Deidamia by others. Ovid. Met. 12.—Plut. in Thes.

Hippŏlŏchus, I. a son of Bellerophon, father to Glaucus, who commanded the Lycians during the Trojan war.——II. A son of Glaucus also bore the same name. Homer. Il. 6, v. 119.

Hippŏlўte, a queen of the Amazons, given in marriage to Theseus by Hercules, who had conquered her, and taken away her girdle by order of Eurystheus. Vid. Hercules. She had a son by Theseus, called Hippolytus. Plut. in Thes.—Propert. 4, el. 3. Vid. Acastus.

Hippŏlўtus, a son of Theseus and Hippolyte, famous for his virtues and his misfortunes. Temples were raised to his memory, particularly at Trœzene, where he received divine honours. According to some accounts, Diana restored him to life. Vid. Phædra, and Part II.

Hippŏmĕdon, a son of Nisimachus and Mythidice, who was one of the seven chiefs who went against Thebes. He was killed by Ismarus, son of Acastus. Apol. 3, c. 6.—Paus. 2, c. 36.

Hippŏmĕnes. Vid. Atalanta.

Hippona, a goddess who presided over horses. Her statues were placed in horses' stables. Juv. 8, v. 157.

Hippothoon, a son of Neptune and Alope, daughter of Cercyon, exposed in the woods by his mother, that her amours with the god might be concealed from her father. Her shame was discovered, and her father ordered him to be put to death. Neptune changed her into a fountain, and the child was preserved by mares; whence his name, and when grown up, placed on his grandfather's throne by the friendship of Theseus. Hygin. fab. 187.—Paus. 1, c. 38.

Honor, a virtue worshipped at Rome. Her first temple was erected by Scipio Africanus, and another was afterwards built by Claudius Marcellus. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 23.

Hora, a goddess at Rome, supposed to be Hersilia, who married Romulus. She was said to preside over beauty. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 851.

Horæ, three sisters, daughters of Jupiter and Themis, according to Hesiod, called Eunomia, Dice, and Irene. They were the same as the seasons who presided over the spring, summer, and winter, and were represented by the poets as opening the gates of heaven and of Olympus. Homer. Il. 5, v. 749.—Paus. 5, c. 11.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 902.

Horta, a divinity among the Romans, who presided over youth, and patronised all exhortations to virtue and honourable deeds. She is the same as Herselia.

Horus, a son of Isis, one of the deities of the Egyptians.

Hospitalis, a surname of Jupiter among the Romans, as the god of hospitality.

Hyacinthus, a son of Amyclas and Diomede, greatly beloved by Apollo and Zephyrus. He returned the former's love, and Zephyrus, incensed at his coldness and indifference, resolved to punish his rival. As Apollo, who was intrusted with the education of Hyacinthus, once played at quoit, with his pupil, Zephyrus blew the quoit, as soon as it was thrown by Apollo, upon the head of Hyacinthus, and he was killed by the blow. Apollo was so disconsolate at the death of Hyacinthus, that he changed his blood into a flower, which bore his name, and placed his body among the constellations. The Spartans also established yearly festivals in honour of the nephew of their king. Paus. 3, c. 19.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 185, &c.—Apollod. 3, &c.

Hyades, five daughters of Atlas, king of Mauretania, who were so disconsolate at the death of their brother Hyas, who had been killed by a wild boar, that they pined away and died. They became stars after death, and were placed near Taurus, one of the 12 signs of the zodiac. They received the name of Hyades from their brother Hyas. Their names are Phaola, Ambrosia, Eudora, Coronis, and Polyxo. To these some have added Thione and Prodice, and they maintained that they were daughters of Hyas and Æthra, one of the Oceanides. Euripides calls them daughters of Erechtheus. The ancients supposed that the rising and setting of the Hyades was always attended with much rain, whence the name (ὑω pluo.) Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 165.—Hygin. fab. 182.—Eurip. in Ion.

Hyas, a son of Atlas, of Mauretania, by Æthra. He was killed in an attempt to rob a lioness of her whelps. Some say that he died by the bite of a serpent, and others that he was killed by a wild boar. Vid. Hyades. Hygin. fab. 192.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 170.

Hydra, a celebrated monster, which infested the neighbourhood of the lake Lerna in Peloponnesus. It was the fruit of Echidna's union with Typhon. It had a hundred heads according to Diodorus; fifty, according to Simonides; and nine according to the more received opinion of Apollodorus, Hyginius, &c. As soon as one of these heads was cut off, two immediately grew up if the wound was not stopped by fire. It was one of the labours of Hercules to destroy this dreadful monster, and this he easily effected with the assistance of Iolaus, who applied a burning iron to the wounds, as soon as one head was cut off. The conqueror dipped his arrows in the gall of the hydra, and, from that circumstance, all the wounds which he gave proved incurable and mortal. Hesiod. Theog.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Paus. 5, c. 17.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 69.—Horat. 4, ob. 4, v. 61.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 276, l. 7, v. 658.

Hygeia, or Hygiea, the goddess of health, daughter of Æsculapius, held in great veneration among the ancients. Her statues represented her with a veil, and the matrons usually consecrated their locks to her. She was also represented on monuments as a young woman, holding a serpent in one hand, and in the other a cup, out of which the serpent sometimes drank. According to some authors, Hygeia is the same as Minerva, who received that name from Pericles, who erected her a statue, because in a dream she had told him the means of curing an architect, whose assistance he wanted to build a temple. Plut. in Pericl.—Paus. 1, c. 23.

Hylas, a son of Thiodamas, king of Mysia, and Menodice, stolen away by Hercules, and carried on board the ship Argo to Colchis. On the Asiatic coast the Argonauts landed to take a supply of fresh water; and Hylas, following the example of his companions, went to the fountain with a pitcher, and fell into the water and was drowned. The poets have embellished this tragical story, by saying, that the nymphs of the river, enamoured of the beautiful Hylas, carried him away; and that Hercules, disconsolate at the loss of his favourite youth, filled the woods and mountains with his complaints, and, at last, abandoned the Argonautic expedition to go and seek him. Apol. 1, c. 9.—Hygin. fab. 14. 271.—Virg. Ecl. 6.—Propert. 1, el. 20.

Hyllus, a son of Hercules and Dejanira, who, soon after his father's death, married Iole. He, as well as his father, was persecuted by the envy of Eurystheus, and obliged to fly from the Peloponnesus. The Athenians gave a kind reception to Hyllus and the rest of the Heraclidæ, and marched against Eurystheus. Hyllus obtained a victory over his enemies, and killed with his own hand Eurystheus, and sent his head to Alcmena, his grandmother. Some time after he attempted to recover the Peloponnesus with the Heraclidæ, and was killed in single combat by Echemus, king of Arcadia. Vid. Heraclidæ, Hercules. Herodot. 7, c. 204, &c.—Strab. 9.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 279. Vid. Part I.

Hylonŏme, the wife of Cyllarus, who killed herself the moment her husband was murdered by the Lapithæ. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 405.

Hymĕnæus, and Hymen, the god of marriage among the Greeks, was son of Bacchus and Venus, or, according to others, of Apollo and one of the muses. Hymenæus, according to the more received opinions, was a young Athenian of extraordinary beauty, but ignoble origin. He became enamoured of the daughter of one of the richest and noblest of his countrymen, and, as the rank and elevation of his mistress removed him from her presence and conversation, he contented himself to follow her wherever she went. In a certain procession, in which all the matrons of Athens went to Eleusis, Hymenæus, to accompany his mistress, disguised himself in woman's clothes, and joined the religious troop. His youth, and the fairness of his features, favoured his disguise. A great part of the procession was seized by the sudden arrival of some pirates, and Hymenæus, who shared the captivity of his mistress, encouraged his female companions, and assassinated their ravishers while they were asleep. Immediately after this, Hymenæus repaired to Athens, and promised to restore to liberty the matrons who had been enslaved, provided he was allowed to marry one among them who was the object of his passion. The Athenians consented, and Hymenæus experienced so much felicity in his marriage state that the people of Athens instituted festivals in his honour, and solemnly invoked him at their nuptials, as the Latins did their Thalassius. Hymen was generally represented as crowned with flowers, chiefly with marjoram or roses, and holding a burning torch in one hand, and in the other a vest of purple colour. It was supposed that he always attended at nuptials; for, if not, matrimonial connexions were fatal, and ended in the most dreadful calamities; and hence people ran about calling aloud, Hymen! Hymen! &c. Ovid. Medea. Met. 12, v. 212.—Virg. Æn. 1, &c.—Catull. ep. 62.

Hyprĕrion, a son of Cœlus and Terra, who married Thea, by whom he had Aurora, the sun and moon. Hyperion is often taken by the poets for the sun itself. Herod. Theog.—Apollod. 1, c. 1 and 2.—Homer. hymn. ad Ap.

Hypermnestra. Vid. Danaides.

Hypsipўle, a queen of Lemnos, daughter of Thoas and Myrine. During her reign, Venus, whose altars had been universally slighted, punished the Lemnian women, and rendered their mouths and breath so extremely offensive to the smell, that their husbands abandoned them, and gave themselves up to some female slaves, whom they had taken in the war against Thrace. This contempt was highly resented by all the women of Lemnos, and they resolved on revenge, and all unanimously put to death their male relations, Hypsipyle alone excepted, who spared the life of her father Thoas. Soon after this cruel murder, the Argonauts landed at Lemnos, in their expedition to Colchis and remained for some time in the island. During their stay the Argonauts rendered the Lemnian women mothers; and Jason, the chief of the Argonautic expedition, left Hypsipyle pregnant at his departure, and promised her eternal fidelity. Hypsipyle brought twins, Euneus and Nebrophonus, whom some have called Deiphilus or Thoas. Jason forgot his vows and promises to Hypsipyle, and the unfortunate queen was soon after forced to leave her kingdom by the Lemnian women, who conspired against her life, still mindful that Thoas had been preserved by means of his daughter. Hypsipyle, in her flight, was seized by pirates, and sold to Lycurgus, king of Nemæa. She was intrusted with the care of Archemorus, the son of Lycurgus; and when the Argives marched against Thebes, they met Hypsipyle, and obliged her to show them a fountain, where they might quench their thirst. To do this more expeditiously, she laid down the child on the grass, and in her absence he was killed by a serpent. Lycurgus attempted to revenge the death of his son, but Hypsipyle was screened from his resentment by Adrastus, the leader of the Argives. Ovid. Heroid. 6.—Apollon. 1.—Stat. 5.—Theb.—Flac. 2.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 6.—Hygin. fab. 15, 74, &c.

I.

Iacchus, a surname of Bacchus, ab ιαχω, from the noise and shouts which the bacchanals raised at the festivals of this deity. Virg. Ecl. 6, G. 1, v. 166.—Ovid. Met. 4, 15.——Some suppose him to be a son of Ceres; because in the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries, the word Iacchus was frequently repeated. Herodot. 8, c. 65.—Paus. 1, c. 2.

Ialmenus, a son of Mars and Astyoche, who went to the Trojan war with his brother Ascalaphus, with 30 ships, at the head of the inhabitants of Orchomenos and Aspledon, in Bœotia. Paus. 9, c. 37.—Homer. Il. 2, v. 19.

Iambe, a servant maid of Metanira, wife of Celeus, king of Eleusis, who tried to exhilarate Ceres when she travelled over Attica in quest of her daughter Proserpine. From the jokes and stories which she made use of, free and satirical verses have been called Iambics. Apollod. 1, c. 5.

Iamidæ, certain prophets among the Greeks, descended from Iamus, a son of Apollo, who received the gift of prophecy from his father, which remained among his posterity. Paus. 6, c. 2.

Janus, the most ancient king who reigned in Italy. He was a native of Thessaly, and son of Apollo, according to some. He came to Italy, where he planted a colony and built a small town on the river Tiber, which he called Janiculum. Some authors make him son of Cœlus and Hecate; and others make him a native of Athens. During his reign, Saturn, driven from heaven by his son Jupiter, came to Italy, where Janus received him with much hospitality, and made him his colleague on the throne. Janus is represented with two faces, because he was acquainted with the past and the future; or, according to others, because he was taken for the sun, who opens the day at his rising, and shuts it at his setting. Some statues represented Janus with four heads. He sometimes appeared with a beard, and sometimes without. In religious ceremonies, his name was always invoked the first, because he presided over all gates and avenues, and it is through him only that prayers can reach the immortal gods. From that circumstance he often appears with a key in his right hand, and a rod in his left. Sometimes he holds the number 300 in one hand, and in the other 65, to show that he presides over the year, of which the first month bears his name. Some suppose that he is the same as the world, or Cœlus; and from that circumstance they call him Eanus, ab eundo, because of the revolution of the heavens. He was called by different names, such as Consivius a consorendo, because he presided over generation; Quirinus or Martialis, because he presided over war. He is also called Patulcius & Clusius, because the gates of his temples were opened during the time of war and shut in time of peace. He was chiefly worshipped among the Romans, where he had many temples, some erected to Janus Bifrons, others to Janus Quadrifrons. The temples of Quadrifrons were built with four equal sides, with a door and three windows on each side. The four doors were the emblems of the four seasons of the year, and the three windows in each of the sides the three months in each season, and all together, the twelve months of the year. Janus was generally represented in statues as a young man. After death, Janus was ranked among the gods, for his popularity, and the civilization which he had introduced among the wild inhabitants of Italy. His temple, which was always open in time of war, was shut only three times during above 700 years, under Numa, 234 B. C., and under Augustus; and during that long period of time, the Romans were continually employed in war. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 65, &c.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 607.—Varro de L. L. 1.—Macrob. Sat. 1.

Japĕtus, a son of Cœlus or Titan, by Terra, who married Asia, or, according to others, Clymene, by whom he had Atlas, Menœtius, Prometheus, and Epimetheus. The Greeks looked upon him as the father of all mankind, and therefore from his antiquity old men were frequently called Japeti. His sons received the patronymic of Impetionides. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 631.—Hesiod. Theog. 136 and 508.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.

Japyx, a son of Dædalus, who conquered a part of Italy, which he called Iapygia. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 458. Vid. Part I.

Iarbas, a son of Jupiter and Garamantis, king of Gætulia, from which Dido bought land to build Carthage. He courted Dido, but the arrival of Æneas prevented his success, and the queen, rather than marry Iarbas, destroyed herself. Vid. Dido. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 36, &c.—Justin. 18, c. 6.—Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 552.

Iasion, and Iasius, a son of Jupiter and Electra, one of the Atlantides, who reigned over part of Arcadia, where he diligently applied himself to agriculture. He married the goddess Cybele, or Ceres, and all the gods were present at the celebration of his nuptials. He had by Ceres two sons, Philomelus and Plutus, to whom some have added a third, Corybas, who introduced the worship and mysteries of his mother in Phrygia. He had also a daughter, whom he exposed as soon as born, saving that he would raise only male children. The child, who was suckled by a she-bear and preserved, rendered herself famous afterwards, under the name of Atalanta. Iasion was killed with a thunderbolt of Jupiter, and ranked among the gods after death by the inhabitants of Arcadia. Hes. The. 970.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 168.—Hyg. Poet. 2, c. 4.

Jason, a celebrated hero, son of Alcimede, daughter of Phylacus, by Æson the son of Cretheus, and Tyro the daughter of Salmoneus. Tyro, before her connexion with Cretheus the son of Æolus, had two son, Pelias and Neleus, by Neptune. Æson was king of Iolchos, and at his death the throne was usurped by Pelias, and Æson, the lawful successor, was driven to retirement and obscurity. The education of young Jason was intrusted to the care of the centaur Chiron, and he was removed from the presence of the usurper, who had been informed by an oracle that one of the descendants of Æolus would dethrone him. After he had made the most rapid progress in every branch of science, Jason left the centaur, and by his advice went to consult the oracle. He was ordered to go to Iolchos, his native country, covered with the spoils of a leopard, and dressed in the garments of a Magnesian. In his journey he was stopped by the inundation of the river Evenus or Enipeus, over which he was carried by Juno, who had changed herself into an old woman. In crossing the streams he lost one of his sandals, and at his arrival at Iolchos, the singularity of his dress and the fairness of his complexion attracted the notice of the people, and drew a crowd around him in the market place. Pelias came to see him with the rest, and as he had been warned by the oracle to beware of a man who should appear at Iolchos with one foot bare and the other shod, the appearance of Jason, who had lost one of his sandals, alarmed him. His terrors were soon augmented. Jason, accompanied by his friends, repaired to the palace of Pelias, and boldly demanded the kingdom which he had unjustly usurped. The boldness and popularity of Jason intimidated Pelias; he was unwilling to abdicate the crown, and yet he feared the resentment of his adversary. As Jason was young and ambitious of glory, Pelias, at once to remove his immediate claims to the crown, reminded him that Æetes, king of Colchis, had severely treated and inhumanly murdered their common relation Phryxus. He observed that such a treatment called aloud for punishment, and that the undertaking would be accompanied with much glory and fame. He farther added, that his old age had prevented him from avenging the death of Phryxus, and that if Jason would undertake the expedition, he would resign to him the crown of Iolchos, when he returned victorious from Colchis. Jason readily accepted the proposal which seemed to promise such military fame. Vid. Argonautæ. After this celebrated conquest he immediately set sail for Europe with Medea, who had been instrumental in his preservation. Jason's partiality for Glauce, the daughter of the king of Corinth, afterwards disturbed their matrimonial happiness, and Medea was divorced that Jason might more freely indulge his amorous propensities. This infidelity was severely revenged by Medea, (Vid. Glauce,) who destroyed her children in the presence of their father. Vid. Medea. After his separation from Medea, Jason lived an unsettled and melancholy life. As he was one day reposing himself by the side of the ship which had carried him to Colchis, a beam fell upon his head, and he was crushed to death. This tragical event had been predicted to him before by Medea, according to the relation of some authors. Some say that he afterwards returned to Colchis, where he seized the kingdom and reigned in great security. *Eurip. in Med.—Ovid. Icărius, I. an Athenian, father of Erigone. He gave wine to some peasants, who drank it with the greatest avidity, ignorant of its intoxicating nature. They were soon deprived of their reason, and the fury and resentment of their friends and neighbours were immediately turned upon Icarius, who perished by their hands. After death he was honoured with public festivals, and his daughter was led to discover the place of his burial by means of his faithful dog Mœra. Erigone hung herself in despair, and was changed into a constellation called Virgo. Icarius was changed into the star Bootes, and the dog Mœra into the star Canis. Hygin. fab. 130.—Apollod. 3, c. 14.——II. A son of Œbalus of Lacedæmon. He gave his daughter Penelope in marriage to Ulysses king of Ithaca, but he was so tenderly attached to her, that he wished her husband to settle at Lacedæmon. Ulysses refused, and when he saw the earnest petitions of Icarius, he told Penelope, as they were going to embark, that she might choose freely either to follow him to Ithaca, or to remain with her father. Penelope blushed in the deepest silence, and covered her head with her veil. Icarius upon this permitted his daughter to go to Ithaca, and immediately erected a temple to the goddess of modesty, on the spot where Penelope had covered her blushes with her veil. Homer. Od. 16, v. 435.

Icărus, a son of Dædalus, who, with his father, fled with wings from Crete to escape the resentment of Minos. His flight being too high, proved fatal to him; the sun melted the wax which cemented his wings, and he fell into that part of the Ægean Sea which was called after his name. Vid. Dædalus. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 178.

Icĕlos, one of the sons of Somnus, who changed himself into all sorts of animals, whence the name (εικελος similis). Ovid. Met. 11, v. 640.

Ida, a nymph of Crete, who went into Phrygia, where she gave her name to a mountain of that country. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 177. Vid. Part I.

Idæa, the surname of Cybele, because she was worshipped on mount Ida. Lucret. 2, v. 611.

Idas, a son of Aphareus and Arane, famous for his valour and military glory. He was among the Argonauts, and married Marpessa, the daughter of Evenus, king of Ætolia. Marpessa was carried away by Apollo, and Idas pursued his wife's ravisher with bows and arrows, and obliged him to restore her. Vid. Marpessa. According to Apollodorus, Idas with his brother Lynceus associated with Pollux and Castor to carry away some flocks; but when they had obtained a sufficient quantity of plunder, they refused to divide it into equal shares. This provoked the sons of Leda; Lynceus was killed by Castor, and Idas, to revenge his brother's death, immediately killed Castor, and in his turn perished by the hand of Pollux. According to Ovid and Pausanias, the quarrel between the sons of Leda and those of Aphareus arose from a more tender cause: Idas and Lynceus, as they say, were going to celebrate their nuptials with Phœbe and Hilaira, the two daughters of Leucippus; but Castor and Pollux, who had been invited to partake the common festivity, offered violence to the brides and carried them away. Idas and Lynceus fell in the attempt to recover their wives. Homer. Il. 9.—Hygin. fab. 14, 100, &c.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 700.—Apollod. 1 and 3.—Paus. 4, c. 2 and 1. 5, c. 18.

Idmon, son of Apollo and Asteria, or, as some say, of Cyrene, was the prophet of the Argonauts. He was killed in hunting a wild boar in Bithynia, where his body received a magnificent funeral. He had predicted the time and manner of his death. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Orph.

Ilaïra, a daughter of Leucippus, carried away with her sister Phœbe, by the sons of Leda, as she was going to be married, &c.

Ilia, or Rhea, a daughter of Numitor, king of Alba, consecrated by her uncle Amulius to the service of Vesta, which required perpetual chastity, that she might not become a mother to dispossess him of his crown. He was, however, disappointed; violence was offered to Ilia, and she brought forth Romulus and Remus, who drove the usurper from his throne, and restored the crown to their grandfather Numitor, its lawful possessor. Ilia was buried alive by Amulius for violating the laws of Vesta; and because her tomb was near the Tiber, some suppose that she married the god of that river. Horat. 1, od. 2.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 277.—Ovid. Fast. 2, 598.

Iliădes, I. a surname given to Romulus, as son of Ilia. Ovid.——II. A name given to the Trojan women. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 484.

Iliŏne, the eldest daughter of Priam, who married Polymnester, king of Thrace. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 657.

Ilithyia, a goddess, called also Juno Lucina. Some suppose her to be the same as Diana. She presided over the travails of women; and in her temple at Rome, it was usual to carry a small piece of money as an offering. This custom was first established by Servius Tullius, who, by enforcing it, was enabled to know the exact number of the Roman people. Hesiod. Th. 450.—*Homer. Illyrius, a son of Cadmus and Hermione, from whom Illyricum received its name. Apol.

Ilus, I. the fourth king of Troy, was son of Tros by Callirhoe. He married Eurydice the daughter of Adrastus, by whom he had Themis, who married Capys, and Laomedon the father of Priam. He built, or rather embellished, the city of Ilium, called also Troy from his father Tros. Jupiter gave him the Palladium, a celebrated statue of Minerva, and promised that as long as it remained in Troy, so long would the town remain impregnable. When the temple of Minerva was in flames, Ilus rushed into the middle of the fire to save the Palladium, for which action he was deprived of his sight by the goddess, though he recovered it some time after.

Inachus, a son of Oceanus and Tethys, father of Io, and also of Phoroneus and Ægialeus. He founded the kingdom of Argos, and was succeeded by Phoroneus, B. C. 1807, and gave his name to a river of Argos, of which he became the tutelar deity. He reigned 60 years. Virg. G. 3, v. 151.—Apollod. 2, c. 3.—Paus. 2, c. 15. Vid. Part I.

Indigetes, a name given to those deities who were worshipped only in some particular places, or who were become gods from men, as Hercules, Bacchus, &c. Some derive the word from inde and geniti, born at the same place where they received their worship. Virg. G. 1, v. 498.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 608.

Ino, a daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia. Vid. Athamas.

Io, daughter of Inachus, or, according to others, of Jasus or Pirenes, was priestess to Juno at Argos. Jupiter became enamoured of her; but Juno, jealous of his intrigues, discovered the object of his affection, and surprised him in the company of Io, though he had shrouded himself in all the obscurity of clouds and thick mists. Jupiter changed his mistress into a beautiful heifer; and the goddess, who well knew the fraud, obtained from her husband the animal whose beauty she had condescended to commend. Juno commanded the hundred-eyed Argus to watch the heifer; but Jupiter, anxious for the situation of Io, sent Mercury to destroy Argus, and to restore her to liberty. Vid. Argus. Io, freed from the vigilance of Argus, was now persecuted by Juno, who sent one of the furies, or rather a malicious insect, to torment her. She wandered over the greatest part of the earth, and crossed over the sea, till at last she stopped on the banks of the Nile, still exposed to the unceasing torments of Juno's insect. Here she entreated Jupiter to restore her to her ancient form; and when the god had changed her from a heifer into a woman, she brought forth Epaphus. Afterwards she married Telagonus, king of Egypt, or Osiris, according to others; and she treated her subjects with such mildness and humanity, that, after death, she received divine honours, and was worshipped under the name of Isis. According to Herodotus, Io was carried away by Phœnician merchants, who wished to make reprisals for Europa, who had been stolen from them by the Greeks. Some suppose that Io never came to Egypt. She is sometimes called Phoronis, from her brother Phoroneus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 748.—Paus. 1, c. 25, l. 3, c. 18.—Moschus.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 789.—Hygin. fab. 145.

Iobates, and Jobates, a king of Lycia, father of Stenobœa, the wife of Prœtus, king of Argos. He was succeeded on the throne by Bellerophon, to whom she had given one of her daughters, called Philonoe, in marriage. Vid. Bellerophon. Apollod. 2, c. 2.—Hygin. fab. 57.

Jocasta, a daughter of Menœceus, who married Laius, king of Thebes, by whom she had Œdipus. She afterwards married her son Œdipus, without knowing who he was, and had by him Æteocles, Polynices, &c. Vid. Laius, Œdipus. When she discovered that she had married her own son, and had been guilty of incest, she hanged herself in despair. She is called Epicasta by some mythologists. *Stat. Iolas, or Iolaus, a son of Iphiclus, king of Thessaly, who assisted Hercules in conquering the hydra, and burnt with a hot iron the place where the heads had been cut off, to prevent the growth of others. He was restored to his youth and vigour by Hebe, at the request of his friend Hercules. Some time afterwards, Iolas assisted the Heraclidæ against Eurystheus, and killed the tyrant with his own hand. According to Plutarch, Iolas had a monument in Bœotia and Phocis, where lovers used to go and bind themselves by the most solemn oaths of fidelity, considering the place as sacred to love and friendship. According to Diodorus and Pausanias, Iolas died and was buried in Sardinia, where he had gone to make a settlement at the head of the sons of Hercules, by the fifty daughters of Thespius. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 399. —Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Paus. 10, c. 17.

Iole, a daughter of Eurytus, king of Œchalia. Her father promised her in marriage to Hercules, but he refused to perform his engagements, and Iole was carried away by force. Vid. Eurytus. It was to extinguish the love of Hercules for Iole, that Dejanira sent him the poisoned tunic which caused his death. Vid. Hercules and Dejanira. After the death of Hercules, Iole married his son Hyllus, by Dejanira. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 270.

Ion, a son of Xuthus and Creusa, daughter of Erechtheus, who married Helice, the daughter of Selinus, king of Ægiale. He succeeded on the throne of his father-in-law, and built a city, which he called Helice, on account of his wife. His subjects from him received the name of Ionians, and the country that of Ionia. Vid. Iones and *Ionia. Iphiclus, or Iphicles, I. a son of Amphitryon and Alcmena, born at the same birth with Hercules. As these two children were together in the cradle, Juno, jealous of Hercules, sent two large serpents to destroy him. At the sight of the serpents, Iphicles alarmed the house; but Hercules, though not a year old, boldly seized them, one in each hand, and squeezed them to death. Apol. 2, c. 4.—Theocrit.——II. Iphigenia, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. When the Greeks, going to the Trojan war, were detained by contrary winds at Aulis, they were informed by one of the soothsayers, that, to appease the gods, they must sacrifice Iphigenia, Agamemnon's daughter, to Diana. As Iphigenia was tenderly loved by her mother, the Greeks sent for her on pretence of giving her in marriage to Achilles. Clytemnestra gladly permitted her departure, and Iphigenia came to Aulis: here she saw the bloody preparations for the sacrifice; she implored the forgiveness and protection of her father, but tears and entreaties were unavailing. Calchas took the knife in his hand, and, as he was going to strike the fatal blow, Iphigenia suddenly disappeared, and a goat of uncommon size and beauty was found in her place for the sacrifice. This supernatural change animated the Greeks, the wind suddenly became favourable, and the combined fleet set sail from Aulis. Iphigenia's innocence had raised the compassion of the goddess on whose altar she was going to be sacrificed, and she carried her to Taurica, where she intrusted her with the care of her temple. In this sacred office Iphigenia was obliged, by the command of Diana, to sacrifice all the strangers which came into that country. Many had already been offered as victims on the bloody altar, when Orestes and Pylades came to Taurica. Their mutual and unparalleled friendship, (Vid. Pylades and Orestes,) disclosed to Iphigenia that one of the strangers whom she was going to sacrifice was her brother; and, upon this, she conspired with the two friends to fly from the barbarous country, and carry away the statue of the goddess. They successfully effected their enterprise, and murdered Thoas, who enforced the human sacrifices. According to some authors, the Iphigenia who was sacrificed at Aulis was not a daughter of Agamemnon, but a daughter of Helen by Theseus. Homer does not speak of the sacrifice of Iphigenia, though very minute in the description of the Grecian forces, adventures, &c. The statue of Diana, which Iphigenia brought away, was afterwards placed in the grove of Aricia, in Italy. Paus. 2, c. 22, l. 3, c. 16.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 31.—*Virg. Iphinŏe, one of the principal women of Lemnos, who conspired to destroy all the males of the island after their return from a Thracian expedition. Flacc. 2, v. 163.

Iphis, I. son of Alector, succeeded his father on the throne of Argos. He advised Polynices, who wished to engage Amphiaraus in the Theban war, to bribe his wife Eriphyle, by giving her the golden collar of Harmonia. This succeeded, and Eriphyle betrayed her husband. Apollod. 3.—Flacc. 1, 3, and 7.——II. A beautiful youth of Salamis, of ignoble birth. Vid. Anaxarete.——III. A daughter of Ligdus and Telethusa, of Crete. When Telethusa was pregnant, Ligdus ordered her to destroy her child if it proved a daughter, because his poverty could not afford to maintain a useless charge. The severe orders of her husband alarmed Telethusa, and she would have obeyed, had not Isis commanded her in a dream to spare the life of her child. Telethusa brought forth a daughter, which was given to a nurse, and passed for a boy under the name of Iphis. Ligdus continued ignorant of the deceit, and when Iphis was come to the years of puberty, her father resolved to give her in marriage to Ianthe, the beautiful daughter of Telestes. A day to celebrate the nuptials was appointed, but Telethusa and her daughter were equally anxious to put off the marriage; and, when all was unavailing, they implored the assistance of Isis, by whose advice the life of Iphis had been preserved. The goddess was moved, she changed the sex of Iphis, and, on the morrow, the nuptials were consummated with the greatest rejoicings. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 666, &c.

Ipnitus, a son of Eurytus, king of Œchalia. When Autolycus stole away the oxen of Eurytus, Iphitus was sent in quest of them, and, in his search, he met with Hercules, whose good favours he had gained by advising Eurytus to give Iole to him in marriage. Hercules assisted Iphitus in seeking the lost animals; but when he recollected the ingratitude of Eurytus, he killed Iphitus by throwing him down from the walls of Tirynthus. *Homer. Isæus, I. a daughter of Cratinus the painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.——II. One of the seasons among the Greeks, called by the moderns Horæ. Her two sisters were Dia and Eunomia, all daughters of Jupiter and Themis. Apollod. 1, c. 3.

Iris, a daughter of Thaumas and Electra, one of the Oceanides, messenger of the gods, and more particularly of Juno. Her office was to cut the thread which seemed to detain the soul in the body of those that were expiring. She is the same as the rainbow, and from that circumstance she is represented with wings, with all the beautiful and variegated colours of the rainbow, and appears sitting behind Juno, ready to execute her commands. She is likewise described as supplying the clouds with water to deluge the world. Hesiod. Theog. v. 266.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 271, and seq. l. 4, v. 481. l. 10, v. 585.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 694. Vid. Part I.

Isis, a celebrated deity of the Egyptians, daughter of Saturn and Rhea, according to Diodorus of Sicily. Some suppose her to be the same as Io. According to some traditions mentioned by Plutarch, Isis married her brother Osiris, and was pregnant by him even before she had left her mother's womb. These two ancient deities, as some authors observe, comprehended all nature and all the gods of the heathens. Isis was the Venus of Cyprus, the Minerva of Athens, the Cybele of the Phrygians, the Ceres of Eleusis, the Proserpine of Sicily, the Diana of Crete, the Bellona of the Romans, &c. Osiris and Isis reigned conjointly in Egypt, but the rebellion of Typhon, the brother of Osiris, proved fatal to this sovereign. Vid. Osiris and Typhon. The ox and cow were the symbols of Osiris and Isis, because these deities, while on earth, had diligently applied themselves in cultivating the earth. Vid. Apis. As Isis was supposed to be the moon and Osiris the sun, she was represented as holding a globe in her hand, with a vessel full of ears of corn. The Egyptians believed that the yearly and regular inundations of the Nile proceeded from the abundant tears which Isis shed for the loss of Osiris, whom Typhon had murdered. This word Isis, according to some, signifies ancient, and, on that account, the inscription of the statues of the goddess were often in these words: I am all that has been, that shall be, and none among mortals has hitherto taken off my veil. The worship of Isis was universal in Egypt; the priests were obliged to observe perpetual chastity, their head was closely shaved, and they always walked barefooted, and clothed themselves in linen garments. They never eat onions, they abstained from salt with their meat, and were forbidden to eat the flesh of sheep and of hogs. During the night they were employed in continual devotion near the statue of the goddess. Cleopatra, the beautiful queen of Egypt, was wont to dress herself like this goddess, and affected to be called a second Isis. Cic. de Div. 1.—Plut. de Isid. & Osirid.—Diod. 1.—*Dionys. Ismēne, a daughter of Œdipus and Jocasta, who, when her sister Antigone had been condemned to be buried alive by Creon, for giving burial to her brother Polynices against the tyrant's positive orders, declared herself as guilty as her sister, and insisted upon being equally punished with her. This instance of generosity was strongly opposed by Antigone, who wished not to see her sister involved in her calamities. Sophocl. in Antig.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.

Ismenius, a surname of Apollo, at Thebes, where he had a temple on the borders of the Ismenus.

Ismēnus, a son of Apollo and Melia, one of the Nereides, who gave his name to the Ladon, a river of Bœotia, near Thebes, falling into the Asopus, and thence into the Euripus. Paus. 9, c. 10.

Issa, a daughter of Macareus, the son of Lycaon. She was beloved by Apollo, who to obtain her confidence changed himself into the form of a shepherd to whom she was attached. This metamorphosis of Apollo was represented on the web of Arachne. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 124.

Itălus, I. a son of Telegonus. Hygin. fab. 127.——II. An Arcadian prince, who came to Italy, where he established a kingdom called after him. It is supposed that he received divine honours after death, as Æneas calls upon him among the deities to whom he paid his adoration when he entered Italy. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 178.

Juno, a celebrated deity among the ancients, daughter of Saturn and Ops. She was sister to Jupiter, Pluto, Neptune, Vesta, Ceres, &c. She was born at Argos, or, according to others, in Samos, and was intrusted to the care of the Seasons, or, as Homer and Ovid mention, to Oceanus and Tethys. At the nuptials of Jupiter and Juno, the gods, all mankind, and all the brute creation, attended. By her marriage with Jupiter, Juno became the queen of all the gods, and mistress of heaven and earth. Her conjugal happiness, however, was frequently disturbed by the numerous amours of her husband, and she showed herself jealous and inexorable in the highest degree. Her severity to the mistresses and illegitimate children of her husband was unparalleled. Juno had some children by Jupiter. According to Hesiod, she was mother of Mars, Hebe, and Ilithya, or Lucina; and, besides these, she brought forth Vulcan, without having any commerce with the other sex. According to others, it was not Vulcan, but Mars, or Hebe, whom she brought forth in this manner. The daily and repeated debaucheries of Jupiter at last provoked Juno to such a degree, that she retired to Eubœa, and resolved for ever to forsake his bed. Jupiter produced a reconciliation, after he had applied to Cithæron for advice, and after he had obtained forgiveness by fraud and artifice. Vid. Dædalus. This reconciliation, however cordial it might appear, was soon dissolved by new offences; and, to stop the complaints of the jealous Juno, Jupiter had often recourse to violence and blows. He even punished the cruelties which she had exercised upon his son Hercules, by suspending her from the heavens by a golden chain, and tying a heavy anvil to her feet. This punishment rather irritated than pacified Juno. She resolved to revenge it, and she engaged some of the gods to conspire against Jupiter, and to imprison him, but Thetis delivered him from this conspiracy by bringing to his assistance the famous Briareus. Apollo and Neptune were banished from heaven for joining in the conspiracy, though some attribute their exile to different causes. The worship of Juno was universal, and even more than that of Jupiter, according to some authors. Her sacrifices were offered with the greatest solemnity. She was particularly worshipped at Argos, Samos, Carthage, and afterwards at Rome. The ancients generally offered on her altars a ewe lamb and a sow the first day of every month. No cows were ever immolated to her, because she assumed the nature of that animal when the gods fled into Egypt in their war with the giants. Among the birds, the hawk, the goose, and particularly the peacock, often called Junonia avis, (Vid. Argus,) were sacred to her. The dittany, the poppy, and the lily, were her favourite flowers. As Juno's power was extended over all the gods, she often made use of the goddess Minerva as her messenger, and even had the privilege of hurling the thunder of Jupiter when she pleased. Her temples were numerous, the most famous of which were at Argos, Olympia, &c. At Rome no woman of debauched character was permitted to enter her temple, or even to touch it. The surnames of Juno are various; they are derived either from the functions or things over which she presided, or from the places where her worship was established. She was the queen of the heavens; she protected cleanliness, and presided over marriage and child-birth, and particularly patronised the most faithful and virtuous of the sex, and severely punished incontinence and lewdness in matrons. She was the goddess of all power and empire, and she was also the patroness of riches. She is represented sitting on a throne with a diadem on her head, and a golden sceptre in her right hand. Some peacocks generally sat by her, and a cuckoo often perched on her sceptre; while Iris behind her displayed the thousand colours of her beautiful rainbow. She is sometimes carried through the air in a rich chariot drawn by peacocks. The Roman consuls, when they entered upon office, were always obliged to offer her a solemn sacrifice. The Juno of the Romans was called Matrona or Romana. She was generally represented as veiled from head to foot, and the Roman matrons always imitated this manner of dressing themselves, and deemed it indecent in any married women to leave any part of her body but her face uncovered. She has received the surname of Samia, Argiva, Telchinia, Imbrasia, Acrea, Cithæroneia, Bunea, Ammonia, Fluonia, Anthea, Tropeia, Parthenos, Teleia, Zera, Ilithyia, Lucinia, Pronuba, Pupulonia, Sospita, Moneta, Curis, Februa, JUPITER, the most powerful of all the gods of the ancients. According to Varro there were no less than 300 persons of that name; Diodorus mentions two; and Cicero three, two of Arcadia and one of Crete. To that of Crete, who passed for the son of Saturn and Ops, the actions of the rest have been attributed. According to the opinion of the mythologists, Jupiter was saved from destruction by his mother, and intrusted to the care of the Corybantes. Saturn, who had received the kingdom of the world from his brother Titan on condition of not raising male children, devoured all his sons as soon as born; but Ops, offended at her husband's cruelty, secreted Jupiter and gave a stone to Saturn, which he devoured on the supposition that it was a male child. Jupiter was educated in a cave on mount Ida, in Crete, and fed upon the milk of the goat Amalthæa, or upon honey, according to others. He received the name of Jupiter, quasi juvans pater. His cries were drowned by the noise of cymbals and drums, which the Corybantes beat at the express command of Ops. Vid. Corybantes. As soon as he was a year old, Jupiter found himself sufficiently strong to make war against the Titans, who had imprisoned his father because he had brought up male children. The Titans were conquered, and Saturn set at liberty by the hands of his son. Saturn, however, soon after, apprehensive of the power of Jupiter, conspired against his life, and was, for this treachery, driven from his kingdom and obliged to fly for safety into Latium. Jupiter divided with his brothers the empire of the world. He reserved for himself the kingdom of heaven, and gave the empire of the sea to Neptune, and that of the infernal regions to Pluto. He married Metes, Themis, Euronyme, Ceres, Mnemosyne, Latona, and Juno, (Vid. Juno,) and became a Proteus to gratify his passions. His children were also numerous as well as his mistresses. According to Apollodorus, 1, c. 3, he was father of the Seasons, Irene, Eunomia, the Fates, Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos, by Themis; of Venus, by Dione; of the Graces, Aglaia, Euphrosyne, and Thalia, by Eurynome, the daughter of Oceanus; of Proserpine, by Styx; of the nine Muses, by Mnemosyne, &c. Vid. Niobe, Laodamia, Pyrrha, Prologenia, Electra, Maia, Semele, &c. The worship of Jupiter was universal; he was the Ammon of the Africans, the Belus of Babylon, the Osiris of Egypt, &c. His surnames were numerous, many of which he received from the place or function over which he presided. He was severally called Jupiter Feretrius, Inventor, Elicius, Apomyos, Capitolinus, Latialis, Pistor, Sponsor, Herceus, Anxurus, Victor, Maximus, Optimos, Olympius, Fluvialis, &c. The worship of Jupiter surpassed that of the other gods in solemnity. His altars were not, like those of Saturn and Diana, stained with the blood of human victims, but he was delighted with the sacrifice of goats, sheep, and white bulls. The oak was sacred to him, because he first taught mankind to live upon acorns. He is generally represented as sitting upon a golden or ivory throne, holding, in one hand, thunderbolts, just ready to be hurled, and, in the other, a sceptre of cypress. His looks express majesty, his beard flows long and neglected, and the eagle stands with expanded wings at his feet. He is sometimes represented with the upper parts of his body naked, and those below the waist carefully covered, as if to show that he is visible to the gods above, but that he is concealed from the sight of the inhabitants of the earth. Jupiter had several oracles, the most celebrated of which were at Dodona, and Ammon in Libya. As Jupiter was the king and father of gods and men, his power was extended over the deities, and every thing was subservient to his will, except the Fates. From him mankind received their blessings and their miseries; and they looked upon him as acquainted with every thing past, present, and future. He was represented at Olympia with a crown like olive branches, his mantle was variegated with different flowers, particularly the lily, and the eagle perched on the top of the sceptre which he held in his hand. The Cretans represented Jupiter without ears, to signify that the sovereign master of the world ought not to give a partial ear to any particular person, but be equally candid and propitious to all. At Lacedæmon he appeared with four heads, that he might seem to hear with greater readiness the different prayers and solicitations which were daily poured to him from every part of the earth. Paus. 1, 2, &c.—Liv. 1, 4, 5, &c.—Diod. 1 and 3.—*Homer. JUTURNA, a sister of Turnus, king of the Rutuli. She heard with contempt the addresses of Jupiter, or, according to others, she was not unfavourable to his passion, so that the god rewarded her love with immortality. She was afterwards changed into a fountain of the same name near the Numicus, falling into the Tiber. The waters of that fountain were used in sacrifices, and particularly in those of Vesta. They had the power to heal diseases. Varro de L. L. 1, c. 10.—Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 708, l. 2, v. 585.—Virg. Æn. 12, v. 139.—Cic. Cluent. 36.

JUVENTAS, or JUVENTUS, a goddess at Rome, who presided over youth and vigour. She is the same as the Hebe of the Greeks, represented as a beautiful nymph, arrayed in variegated garments. Liv. 5, c. 54, l. 21, c. 62, l. 36, c. 36.—Ovid. ex Pont. 1, ep. 9, v. 12.

IXION, a king of Thessaly, son of Phlegas, or, according to Hyginus, of Leontes, or, according to Diodorus, of Antion, by Perimela, daughter of Amythaon. He married Dia, daughter of Eioneus or Deioneus, and promised his father-in-law a valuable present for the choice he had made of him to be his daughter's husband. Unwilling, however, to fulfil his promises, he invited his father-in-law to a feast at Larissa, the capital of his kingdom, and when Deioneus was come, according to the appointment, he threw him into a pit which he had previously filled with wood and burning coals.

This premeditated treachery so irritated the neighbouring princes, that all of them refused to perform the usual ceremonies by which a man was then purified of murder, and Ixion was shunned and despised by all mankind. Jupiter had compassion upon him, and carried him to heaven, and introduced him at the tables of the gods. Here he became enamoured of Juno, who was willing to gratify his passion, though, according to others, she informed Jupiter of the attempt on her virtue. Jupiter made a cloud in the shape of Juno, and carried it to the place where Ixion had appointed to meet Juno. Ixion was caught in the snare, and from his embrace with the cloud, he had the Centaurs, or, according to others, Centaurus. Vid. Centauri. Jupiter, displeased with the insolence of Ixion banished him from heaven; but when he heard that he had seduced Juno, the god struck him with his thunder, and ordered Mercury to tie him to a wheel in hell which continually whirls round. The wheel was perpetually in motion, therefore the punishment of Ixion was eternal. Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 62.—Pindar. 2.—Pyth. 2.—Virg. G. 4, v. 484.—Æn. 6, v. 601.—*Ovid. L.

Labdacĭdes, a name given to Œdipus, as descended from Labdacus.

Labdăcus, a son of Polydorus by Nycteis, the daughter of Nycteus, king of Thebes. His father and mother died during his childhood, and he was left to the care of Nycteus, who at his death left his kingdom in the hands of Lycus, with orders to restore it to Labdacus as soon as of age. He was father to Laius. It is unknown whether he ever sat on the throne of Thebes. According to Statius, his father's name was Phœnix. His descendants were called Labdacides. Stat. Theb. 6, v. 451.—Apol. 3, c. 5.—Paus. 2, c. 6, l. 9, c. 5.

Labradeus, a surname of Jupiter in Caria. The word is derived from labrys, which in the language of the country signifies a hatchet, which Jupiter's statue held in his hand. Plut.

Labyrinthus, a building whose numerous passages and perplexing windings render the escape from it difficult, and almost impracticable. There were four very famous among the ancients, one near the city of Crocodiles or Arsinoe, another in Crete, a third at Lemnos, and a fourth in Italy, built by Porsenna. That of Egypt was the most ancient, and Herodotus, who saw it, declares that the beauty and the art of the building were almost beyond belief. It was built by twelve kings, who at one time reigned in Egypt, and it was intended for the place of their burial, and to commemorate the actions of their reign. It was divided into 12 halls, or according to Pliny, into 16, or as Strabo mentions, into 27. The halls were vaulted according to the relation of Herodotus. They had each six doors, opening to the north, and the same number to the south, all surrounded by one wall. The edifice contained 3000 chambers, 1500 in the upper part, and the same number below. She chambers above were seen by Herodotus, and astonished him beyond conception, but he was not permitted to see those below, where were buried the holy crocodiles and the monarchs whose munificence had raised the edifice. The roofs and walls were incrusted with marble, and adorned with sculptured figures. The halls were surrounded with stately and polished pillars of white stone, and, according to some authors, the opening of the doors was artfully attended with a terrible noise, like peals of thunder. The labyrinth of Crete was built by Dædalus, in imitation of that of Egypt, and it is the most famous of all in classical history. It was the place of confinement for Dædalus himself, and the prison of the Minotaur. According to Pliny, the labyrinth of Lemnos surpassed the others in grandeur and magnificence. It was supported by forty columns of uncommon height and thickness, and equally admirable for their beauty and splendour. Mela. 1, c. 9.—Plin. 36, c. 13.—Strab. 10.—Diod. 1.—Herodot. 2, c. 148.—*Virg. Lăcĕdæmon, a son of Jupiter and Taygeta, the daughter of Atlas, who married Sparta, the daughter of Eurotas, by whom he had Amyclas and Eurydice, the wife of Acrisius. He was the first who introduced the worship of the Graces in Laconia, and who first built them a temple. From Lacedæmon and his wife, the capital of Laconia was called Lacedæmon and Sparta. Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Hygin. fab. 155.—Paus. 3, c. 1. Vid. Part I.

Læstrygŏnes, the most ancient inhabitants of Sicily. Some suppose them to be the same as the people of Leontium, and to have been neighbours to the Cyclops. They fed on human flesh, and when Ulysses came on their coasts, they sunk his ships and devoured his companions. Vid. Antiphates. They were of a gigantic stature, according to Homer, who however does not mention their country, but only speaks of Lamus as their capital. A colony of them, as some suppose, passed over into Italy, with Lamus at their head, where they built the town of Formiæ, whence the epithet of Læstrygonia is often used for that of *Formiana. Laĭades, a patronymic of Œdipus, son of Laius. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 18.

Laius, a son of Labdacus, who succeeded to the throne of Thebes, which his grandfather Nycteus had left to the care of his brother Lycus till his grandson came of age. He was driven from his kingdom by Amphion and Zethus, who were incensed against Lycus for the indignities which Antiope had suffered. He was afterwards restored, and married Jocasta, the daughter of Creon. Vid. Œdipus. Sophocl. in Œdip.—Hygin. 9 and 66.—Diod. 4.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Paus. 9, c. 5 and 26.—Plut. de Curios.

Lămia and Auxesia, two deities of Crete, whose worship was the same as at Eleusis. The Epidaurians made them two statues of an olive tree given them by the Athenians, provided they came to offer a sacrifice to Minerva at Athens. Paus. 2, c. 30, &c.

Lămiæ, certain monsters of Africa, who had the face and breast of a woman, and the rest of the body like that of a serpent. They allured strangers to come to them, that they might devour them; and though they were not endowed with the faculty of speech, yet their hissings was pleasing and agreeable. Some believe them to be witches, or rather evil spirits, who, under the form of a beautiful woman, enticed young children and devoured them. According to some, the fable of the Lamiæ is derived from the amours of Jupiter with a certain beautiful women called Lamia, whom the jealousy of Juno rendered deformed, and whose children she destroyed; upon which Lamia became insane, and so desperate that she eat up all the children that came in her way. They are also called Lemures. Vid. Lemures. Philostr. in Ap.—Horat. Art. Poet. v. 340.—Plut. de Curios.—Dion.

Lampētia, I. a daughter of Apollo and Neæra. She, with her sister Phætusa, guarded her father's flocks in Sicily when Ulysses arrived on the coasts of that island. The companions of Ulysses, impelled by hunger, paid no regard to their sanctity, but carried away and killed some of the oxen. They then embarked on board their ships, but here the resentment of Jupiter followed them. A storm arose, and they all perished except Ulysses, who saved himself on the broken piece of a mast. Homer. Od. 12, v. 119.—Propert. 3, el. 12.——II. According to Ovid. Met. 2, v. 349, Lampetia is one of the Heliades, who was changed into a poplar tree at the death of her brother Phaeton.

Lampeto, and Lampedo, a queen of the Amazons, who boasted herself to be the daughter of Mars. She gained many conquests in Asia, where she founded several cities. She was surprised afterwards by a band of barbarians, and destroyed with her female attendants. Justin. 2, c. 4.

Lāmus, I. a king of the Læstrygones, who is supposed by some to have founded Formiæ in Italy. The family of the Lamiæ at Rome was, according to the opinion of some, descended from him. Horat. 3, od. 17.——II. A son of Hercules and Omphale, who succeeded his mother on the throne of Lydia. Ovid. Heroid. 9, v. 54. Vid. Part I.

Lāocoon, a son of Priam and Hecuba, or, according to others, of Antenor, or of Capys. As being priest of Apollo, he was commissioned by the Trojans to offer a bullock to Neptune to render him propitious. During the sacrifice, two enormous serpents issued from the sea and attacked Laocoon's two sons, who stood next to the altar. The father immediately attempted to defend his sons, but the serpents falling upon him squeezed him in their complicated wreaths, so that he died in the greatest agonies. This punishment was inflicted upon him for his temerity in dissuading the Trojans to bring into the city the fatal wooden horse which the Greeks had consecrated to Minerva, as also for his impiety in hurling a javelin against the sides of the horse as it entered within the walls. Hyginus attributes this to his marriage against the consent of Apollo, or, according to others, for his polluting the temple, by his commerce with his wife Antiope, before the statue of the god. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 41 and 201.—Hygin. fab. 135.

Laodāmas, I. a son of Alcinous, king of the Phæacians, who offered to wrestle with Ulysses while at his father's court. Ulysses, mindful of the hospitality of Alcinous, refused the challenge of Laodamas. Homer. Od. 7, v. 170.—— II. A son of Eteocles, king of Thebes. Paus. 9, c. 15.

Laodāmia, I. a daughter of Acastus and Astydamia, who married Protesilaus, the son of Iphiclus, king of a part of Thessaly. When she heard that he had fallen by the hand of Hector, to keep alive the memory of a husband whom she had tenderly loved, she ordered a wooden statue to be made and regularly placed in her bed. Iphiclus ordered the wooden image to be burned, in hopes of dissipating his daughter's grief. He did not succeed. Laodamia threw herself into the flames with the image, and perished. This circumstance has given occasion to fabulous traditions related by the poets, which mention, that Protesilaus was restored to life, and to Laodamia, for three hours; and that when he was obliged to return to the infernal regions, he persuaded his wife to accompany him. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 447.—Ovid. Her. ep. 13. —Hygin. fab. 104.—Propert. 1, el. 19.——II. A daughter of Bellerophon by Achemone, the daughter of king Iobates. She had a son by Jupiter, called Sarpedon. She dedicated herself to the service of Diana, and hunted with her; but her haughtiness proved fatal to her, and she perished by the arrows of the goddess. Homer. Il. 6, 12 and 16.

Laodice, a daughter of Priam and Hecuba, who became enamoured of Acamas, son of Theseus, when he came with Diomedes from the Greeks to Troy with an embassy to demand the restoration of Helen. She afterwards married Helicaon son of Antenor, and Telephus king of Mysia. Some call her Astyoche. According to the Greek scholiast of Lycophron, Laodice threw herself from the top of a tower and was killed when Troy was sacked by the Greeks. Dictys Cret. 1.—Paus. 13, c. 26.—Homer. Il. 3 and 6.——II. A daughter of Agamemnon, called also Electra. Homer. Il. 9. Vid. Part II.

Laodocus, a son of Antenor, whose form Minerva borrowed, to advise Pandarus to break the treaty which subsisted between the Greeks and Trojans. Homer. Il. 4.

Laogoras, a king of the Dryopes, who accustomed his subjects to become robbers. He plundered the temple of Apollo at Delphi, and was killed by Hercules. Apol. 2, c. 7.—Diod. 4.

Laomedon, son of Ilus, king of Troy, married Strymo, called by some Placia, or Leucippe, by whom he had Podarces, afterwards known by the name of Priam, and Hesione. He built the walls of Troy, and was assisted by Apollo and Neptune, whom Jupiter had banished from heaven, and condemned to be subservient to the will of Laomedon for one year. When the walls were finished, Laomedon refused to reward the labours of the gods, and soon after his territories were laid waste by the god of the sea, and his subjects were visited by a pestilence sent by Apollo. He was put to death by Hercules after a reign of 29 years. Vid. Hesione. Homer. Il. 21,—Virg. Æn. 2 and 9.—Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 6.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Paus. 7, c. 20.—Horat. 3, od. 3.—Hygin. 89.

Laothoe, a daughter of Altes, a king of the Leleges, who married Priam, and became mother of Lycaon and Polydorus. Homer. Il. 21, v. 85.

Laphria, a surname of Diana at Patræ, in Achaia, where she had a temple, with a statue of gold and ivory, which represented her in the habit of a huntress. The statue was made by Menechmus and Soidas, two artists of celebrity. This name was given to the goddess from Laphirus, the son of Delphus, who consecrated the statue to her. There was a festival of the goddess there, called also Laphria, of which Paus. 7, c. 18, gives an account.

Lapithæ, a people of Thessaly. Vid. Lapithus.

Lapithus, a son of Apollo, by Stilbe. He was brother to Centaurus, and married Orsinome, daughter of Euronymus, by whom he had Phorbas and Periphas. The name of Lapithæ was given to the numerous children of Phorbas and Periphas, or rather to the inhabitants of the country of which they had obtained the sovereignty. The chief of the Lapithæ assembled to celebrate the nuptials of Pirithous, one of their number, and among them were Theseus, Dryas, Hopleus, Mopsus, Phalerus, Exadius, Prolochus, Titaresius, &c. The Centaurs were also invited to partake the common festivity, and the amusements would have been harmless and innocent, had not one of the intoxicated Centaurs offered violence to Hippodamia, the wife of Pirithous. The Lapithæ resented the injury, and the Centaurs supported their companions, upon which the quarrel became universal, and ended in blows and slaughter. Many of the Centaurs were slain, and at last were obliged to retire. Vid. Centauri. The invention of bits and bridles for horses is attributed to the Lapithæ. Virg. G. 3, v. 115. Æn. 6, v. 601, l. 7, v. 305.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 530, l. 14, v. 670.—Hesiod. in Scut.—Diod. 4.—Pind. 2.—Pyth.—Strab. 9.—Stat. Theb. 7, v. 304.

Lara, or Laranda, one of the Naiads, daughter of the river Almon, in Latium, famous for her beauty and her loquacity, which her parents long endeavoured to correct, but in vain. She revealed to Juno the amours of her husband Jupiter with Juturna, for which the god cut off her tongue, and ordered Mercury to conduct her to the infernal regions. Lara became mother of two children, to whom the Romans have paid divine honours, according to the opinion of some, under the name of Lares. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 599.

Lares, gods of inferior power at Rome, who presided over houses and families. They were two in number, sons of Mercury by Lara. Vid. Lara. In process of time their power was extended not only over houses, but also over the country and sea; and we find Lares Urbani to preside over the cities, Familiares over houses, Rustici over the country, Compitales over cross roads, Marini over the sea, Viales over the roads, Patellarii, &c. According to the opinion of some, the worship of the gods Lares, who are supposed to be the same as the manes, arises from the ancient custom, among the Romans and other nations, of burying their dead in their houses, and from their belief that their spirits continually hovered over the houses for the protection of its inhabitants. The statues of the Lares, resembling monkeys, and covered with the skin of a dog, were placed in a niche behind the doors of the houses, or around the hearths. At the feet of the Lares was the figure of a dog barking, to intimate their care and vigilance. Incense was burnt on their altars, and a sow was also offered on particular days. Their festivals were observed at Rome in the month of May, when their statues were crowned with garlands of flowers, and offerings of fruit presented. The word Lares seems to be derived from the Etruscan word Lars, which signifies conductor or leader. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 129.—Juv. 8, v. 8.—Plut. in Quæst. Rom.—Varro de L. L. 4, c. 10.—Horat. 3, od. 23.—Plaut. in Aul. & Cist.

Larva, a name given to wicked spirits. The word itself signifies a mask. Vid. Lemures.

Latialis, a surname of Jupiter, who was worshipped by the inhabitants of Latium upon mount Albanus at stated times. The festivals, which were first instituted by Tarquin the Proud, lasted 15 days. Liv. 21. Vid. Feriæ Latinæ.

Latinus, I. a son of Faunus by Marica, king of the Aborigines in Italy, who from him were called Latini. He married Amata, by whom he had a son and a daughter. Vid. Æneas.—II. A son of Sylvius Æneas, surnamed also Sylvius. He was the 5th king of the Latins, and succeeded his father. He was father to Alba his successor. Dion. 1, c. 15.—Liv. 2, c. 3.

Latobius, the god of health among the Corinthians.

Latois, a name of Diana, as being the daughter of Latona.

Latona, a daughter of Cœus the Titan and Phœbe, or, according to Homer, of Saturn. She was admired for her beauty, and celebrated for the favours which she granted to Jupiter. Juno, always jealous of her husband's amours, made Latona the object of her vengeance, and sent the serpent Python to disturb her peace and prosecute her. Latona wandered from place to place in the time of her pregnancy, continually alarmed for fear of Python. She was driven from heaven, and Terra, influenced by Juno, refused to give her a place where she might find rest and bring forth. Neptune, moved with compassion, struck with his trident, and made immoveable the island of Delos, which before wandered in the Ægean, and appeared sometimes above, and sometimes below, the surface of the sea. Latona, changed into a quail by Jupiter, came to Delos, where she resumed her original shape, and gave birth to Apollo and Diana, leaning against a palm tree or an olive. Her repose was of short duration; Juno discovered the place of her retreat, and obliged her to fly from Delos. She wandered over the greatest part of the world; and in Caria, where her fatigue compelled her to stop, she was insulted and ridiculed by peasants of whom she asked for water while they were weeding a marsh. Their refusal and insolence provoked her, and she entreated Jupiter to punish their barbarity. They were all changed into frogs. Her beauty proved fatal to the giant Tityus, whom Apollo and Diana put to death. Vid. Tityus. At last, Latona became a powerful deity, and saw her children receive divine honours. Her worship was generally established where her children received adoration, particularly at Argos, Delos, &c., where she had temples. She had an oracle in Egypt, celebrated for the true decisive answers which it gave. Diod. 5.—He-

LAVERNA, the goddess of thieves and dishonest persons at Rome. She did not only preside over robbers, called from her Laverniones, but she protected such as deceived others, or formed their secret machinations in obscurity and silence. Her worship was very popular, and the Romans raised her an altar near one of the gates of the city, which, from that circumstance, was called the gate of Laverna. She was generally represented by a head without a body. Horat. 1, ep. 16, v. 60.—Varro de L. L. 4.

LAVINIA, a daughter of king Latinus and Amata. She was betrothed to her relation King Turnus, but because the oracle ordered her father to marry her to a foreign prince, she was given to Æneas after the death of Turnus. At her husband's death she was left pregnant; and being fearful of the tyranny of Ascanius, her son-in-law, she fled into the woods, where she brought forth a son called Æneas Sylvius. Dionys. Hal. 1.—Virg. Æn. 6 and 7.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 507.—Liv. 1, c. 1.

LAUSUS, I, a son of Numitor, and brother of Ilia. He was put to death by his uncle Amulius, who usurped his father's throne. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 54.——II. A son of Mezentius, king of the Tyrrhenians, killed by Æneas in the war which his father and Turnus made against the Trojans. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 649, l. 10, v. 426, &c.

LEARCHUS, a son of Athamas and Ino. Vid. Athamas.

LEDA, a daughter of king Thespius and Eurythemis, who married Tyndarus, king of Sparta. Vid. Castor. Some mythologists attribute her amour with Jupiter to Nemesis; and they further mention, that Leda was intrusted with the education of the children which sprang from the eggs brought forth by Nemesis. Vid. Helena. To reconcile this diversity of opinions, others maintain that Leda received the name of Nemesis after death. Homer and Hesiod make no mention of the metamorphosis of Jupiter into a swan, whence some have imagined that the fable was unknown to these two ancient poets, and probably invented since their age. Apollod. 1, c. 8, l. 3, c. 10.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 109.—Hesiod. 17, v. 55.—Hygin. fab. 77.—Isocr. in Hel.—Homer. Od. 11.—Eurip. in Hel.

LELAPS, I. a dog that never failed to seize and conquer whatever animal he was ordered to pursue. It was given to Procris by Diana, and Procris reconciled herself to her husband by presenting him with that valuable present. According to some, Procris had received it from Minos, as a reward for the dangerous wounds of which she had cured him. Hygin. fab. 128. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 771.—Paus. 9, c. 19.——II. One of Actæon's dogs. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 211.

LĔMŪRES, the manes of the dead. The ancients suppose that the souls, after death, wandered all over the world, and disturbed the peace of its inhabitants. The good spirits were called Lares familiares, and the evil ones were known by the name of Larvæ, or Lemures. They terrified the good, and continually haunted the wicked and impious; and the Romans had the superstition to celebrate festivals in their honour, called Lemuria, or Lemuralia, in the month of May. They were first instituted by Romulus to appease the manes of his brother Remus, from whom they were called Remuria, and by corruption, Lemuria. These solemnities continued three nights, during which the temples of the gods were shut, and marriages prohibited. It was usual for the people to throw black beans on the graves of the deceased, or to burn them, as the smell was supposed to be insupportable to them. They also muttered magical words, and, by beating kettles and drums, they believed that the ghosts would depart, and no longer come to terrify their relations upon earth. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 421, &c.—Horat. 2, ep. 2, v. 209.—Persius 5, v. 185.

LENÆUS, a surname of Bacchus, from λῆνος, a winepress. There was a festival called Lenæa, celebrated in his honour, in which the ceremonies observed at the other festivals of the god chiefly prevailed. There were, besides, poetical contentions, &c. Paus.—Virg. G. 2, v. 4. Æn. 4. v. 207.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 14. Vid. Part II.

LEOS, a son of Orpheus, who immolated his three daughters for the good of Athens. Vid. Leocorion.

LESTRYGŌNES. Vid. Læstrygones.

LĒTHE, I. one of the rivers of hell, whose waters the souls of the dead drank after they had been confined for a certain space of time in Tartarus. It had the power of making them forget whatever they had done, seen, or heard before, as the name implies, λήθη, oblivion.——II. Lethe is a river of Africa, near the Syrtes, which runs under the ground, and some time after rises again; whence the origin of the fable of the Lethean streams of oblivion.——III. Another in Bœotia, whose waters were drunk by those who consulted the oracle of Trophonius. Lucan. 9, v. 355.—Ovid. Trist. 4, el. 1, v. 47.—Virg. G. 4, v. 545. Æn. 6, v. 714.—Ital. 1, v. 235, l. 10, v. 556.—Paus. 9, c. 39.—Horat. 4, od. 7, v. 27.

LEVĀNA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the action of the person who took up from the ground a newly-born child after it had been placed there by the midwife. This was generally done by the father, and so religiously observed was this ceremony, that the legitimacy of a child could be disputed without it.

LEUCE, I. a small island in the Euxine Sea, of a triangular form, between the mouths of the Danube and the Borysthenes. According to the poets, the souls of the ancient heroes were placed there as in the Elysian fields, where they enjoyed perpetual felicity, and reaped the repose to which their benevolence to mankind, and their exploits during life, seemed to entitle them. From that circumstance it has been often called the island of the blessed, &c. According to some accounts, Achilles celebrated there his nuptials with Iphigenia, or rather Helen, and shared the pleasures of the place with the manes of Ajax, &c. Strab. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Ammian. 22.—Q. Calab. 3, v. 773.——II. One of the Oceanides, whom Pluto carried into his kingdom.

LEUCIPPE, I. a brother of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, who married Philodice, daughter of Inachus, by whom he had two daughters, Hilaira and Phœbe, known by the patronymic of Leucippides. They were carried away by their cousins Castor and Pollux, as they were going to celebrate their nuptials with Lyncus and Idas. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 701.—Apollod. 3, c. 10, &c.—Paus. 3, c. 17 and 26.——II. A son of Xanthus, descended from Bellerophon. He became deeply enamoured of one of his sisters. Some time after the father resolved to give his daughter in marriage to a Lycian prince. The future husband was informed that the daughter of Xanthus secretly entertained a lover, and he communicated the intelligence to the father. Xanthus upon this secretly watched his daughter, and when Leucippus had introduced himself to her bed, the father, in his eagerness to discover the seducer, occasioned a little noise in the room. The daughter was alarmed, and as she attempted to escape, she received a mortal wound from her father, who took her to be the lover. Leucippus came to her assistance, and stabbed his father in the dark, without knowing who he was. This accidental parricide obliged Leucippus to fly from his country. He came to Crete, where the inhabitants refused to give him an asylum when acquainted with the atrociousness of his crime, and he at last came to Ephesus, where he died in the greatest misery and remorse. Hermesianax apud Parthen. c. 5.—— III. A son of Œnomaus, who became enamoured of Daphne, and to obtain her confidence disguised himself in a female dress, and attended his mistress as a companion. He gained the affections of Daphne by his obsequiousness and attention, but his artifice at last proved fatal through the influence and jealousy of his rival Apollo; for when Daphne and her attendants were bathing in the Ladon, the sex of Leucippus was discovered, and he perished by the darts of the females. Parthen. Erot. c. 15.—Paus. 8, c. 20.

Leucothoa, or Leucothea, I. the wife of Athamas, changed into a sea deity. Vid. Ino. She was called Mutura by the Romans, who raised her a temple, where all the people, particularly women, offered vows for their brother's children. They did not entreat the deity to protect their own children, because Ino had been unfortunate in hers. No female slaves were permitted to enter the temple, or if their curiosity tempted them to transgress this rule, they were beaten away with the greatest severity. To this supplication for other people's children, Ovid alludes in these lines, Fast. 6:—

Non tamen hanc, pro stirpe suâ pia mater adorat, Ipsa parum felix visa fuisse parens.

——II. A daughter of king Orchamus, by Eurynome. Apollo became enamoured of her, when Clytia, who tenderly loved Apollo, and was jealous of his amours with Leucothoe, discovered the whole intrigue to her father, who ordered his daughter to be buried alive. The lover, unable to save her from death, sprinkled nectar and ambrosia on her tomb, which penetrating as far as the body, changed it into a beautiful tree, which bears the frankincense. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 196. Vid. Part I.

Libentina, a surname of Venus, who had a temple at Rome, where the young women used to dedicate the toys and childish amusements of their youth when arrived at nubile years. Varro de L. L. 5, c. 6.

Liber, a surname of Bacchus, which signifies free. He received this name from his delivering some cities of Bœotia from slavery, or, according to others, because wine, of which he was the patron, delivered mankind from their cares, and made them speak with freedom and unconcern. The word is often used for wine itself. Senec. de tranq. anim.

Libera, I. a goddess, the same as Proserpine. Cic. in Ver. 4, c. 48.——II. A name given to Ariadne by Bacchus, or Liber, when he had married her. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 513.

Libertas, a goddess of Rome, who had a temple on mount Aventine, raised by T. Gracchus, and improved and adorned by Pollio with many elegant statues and brazen columns, and a gallery in which were deposited the public acts of the state. She was represented as a woman in a light dress, holding a rod in one hand and a cap in the other, both signs of independence, as the former was used by the magistrates in the manumission of slaves, and the latter was worn by slaves who were soon to be set at liberty. Sometimes a cat was placed at her feet, as this animal is very fond of liberty, and impatient when confined. Liv. 24, c. 16, l. 25, c. 7.—Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 1, v. 72.—Plut. in Grac.—Dio. Cas. 44.

Libitina, a goddess at Rome, who presided over funerals. According to some she is the same as Venus, or rather Proserpine. Servius Tullius first raised her a temple at Rome, where every thing necessary for funerals were exposed to sale, and where the registers of the dead were usually kept. Dionys. Hal. 4.—Liv. 40, c. 19.—Val. Max. 5, c. 2.—Plut. Quæst. Rom.—From the name of the goddess, those who took charge of funerals at Rome were called Libitinarii. Plutarch considers the question why the Romans made the same goddess under the name of Venus in the one instance, and of Libitina in the other, preside over the period of birth and also of death; and thinks that they desired to suggest thereby the brevity of life. With the same intention the Greeks had at Delphi an image of Venus Epitymbia (Ἐπιτυμβία). Servius Tullius, with a view of ascertaining the number of deaths which occurred annually, enacted that a piece of money should be deposited in the temple on occasion of every funeral. Millim.—Plut.—Dionys. Hal.

Libya, a daughter of Epaphus and Cassiopea, who became mother of Agenor and Belus by Neptune. Apollod. 2, c. 1, l. 3, c. 1.—Paus. 1, 44. Vid. Part I.

Lichas, a servant of Hercules, who brought him the poisoned tunic from Dejanira. He was thrown by his master into the sea with great violence, and changed into a rock in the Eubœan Sea. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 211.

Licymnius, a son of Electryon and brother of Alcmena. He was so infirm in his old age, that when he walked he was always supported by a slave. Triptolemus, son of Hercules, seeing the slave inattentive to his duty, threw a stick at him, which unfortunately killed Licymnius. The murderer fled to Rhodes. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Diod. 5.—Homer. Il. 2.—Pind. Olymp. 7.

Linus, "was the son of Urania by Amphimarus, the son of Neptune. The renown which he acquired for his skill in music was superior not only to that of his contemporaries, but to that of all his predecessors; and he is said to have been slain by Apollo for attempting to compare his skill in singing with that of the god. Indeed the death of Linus was lamented by every barbarous nation; and among the Egyptians there is a song which the Greeks call Linus: for this song is denominated by the Egyptians Maneroon. But the Greeks, and among these Homer, mention this song as Grecian. For Homer, being well acquainted with the misfortune of Linus, says that Vulcan represented, among others things, in the shield of Achilles, a boy playing on a harp, and singing the fate of Linus:—

'To these a youth awakes the warbling strings,
Whose tender lay the fate of Linus sings.'

But Pamphus, who composed the most ancient hymns for the Athenians, says, that grief for the death of Linus increased to that degree, that he came to be called Oitolinos, or lamentable Linus. And afterwards the Lesbian Sappho, having learned the name Oitolinos from the verses of Pamphus, celebrates in her poems Adonis and Oitolinos. The Thebans, too, boast that Linus was buried in their country; and they say, that after the loss of the Greeks at Chæronea, Philip the son of Amyntas, in consequence of a vision in a dream, brought the bones of Linus to Macedonia; and afterwards, from another dream, carried back the bones to Thebes. The covering however of this tomb, and every thing else belonging to it, have, they say, been obliterated through length of time. The Thebans likewise assert, that there was a junior Linus, the son of Ismenius; and that when but a boy he was slain by Hercules, whom he instructed in music." Pausanius. "However, neither the Linus, the son of Amphimarus, nor he who was the son of Ismenius, composed any thing in verse; or, if they did, it has not been transmitted to posterity. According to Suidas, he was a poet of Chalcis, and the first that brought the knowledge of letters from Phœnicia to Greece. He taught Hercules letters, and is said to have ranked as the prince of lyric poets. Two fragments are all the remains of his works at present." Taylor.

Liriope, one of the Oceanides, mother of Narcissus by the Cephisus. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 311.

Lissa, the name of a fury whom Euripides introduces on the stage as conducted by Iris, at the command of Juno, to inspire Hercules with that fatal rage which ended in his death.

Lotis, or Lotos, a beautiful nymph, daughter of Neptune. To save herself from the importunities of Priapus, she implored the gods, who changed her into a tree called Lotus, consecrated to Venus and Apollo. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 348.

Lotophagi, a people on the coast of Africa near the Syrtes. They received this name from their living upon the lotus. Ulysses visited their country at his return from the Trojan war. Herodot. 4, c. 177.—Strab. 17.—Mela, 1, c. 7.—Plin. 5, c. 7, l. 13, c. 17.

Lua, a goddess at Rome, who presided over things which were purified by lustrations, whence the name (a luendo.) She is supposed to be the same as Ops or Rhea.

Lucifer, the name of the planet Venus, or morning star. It is called Lucifer, when appearing in the morning before the sun; but when it follows it, and appears some time after its setting, it is called Hesperus. According to some mythologists, Lucifer was son of Jupiter and Aurora.

Lucina, a goddess, daughter of Jupiter and Juno, or, according to others, of Latona. As her mother brought her into the world without pain, she became the goddess whom women in labour invoked, and she presided over the birth of children. She receives this name either from lucus or from lux, as Ovid explains it:—

Gratia Lucinæ, dedit hæc tibi nomine lucus;
Aut quia principium tu, Dea, lucis habes.

Some suppose her to be the same as Diana and Juno, because these two goddesses were also sometimes called Lucina, and presided over the labours of women. She is called Ilythia by the Greeks. She had a famous temple at Rome, raised A. U. C. 396. Varr. de L. L. 4.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 27.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 449.—Horat. Carm. Sec.

Luna, (the moon,) was daughter of Hyperion and Terra, and was the same, according to some mythologists, as Diana. She was worshipped by the ancient inhabitants of the earth with with many superstitious forms and ceremonies. It was supposed that magicians and enchanters, particularly those of Thessaly, had an uncontrollable power over the moon, and that they could draw her down from heaven at pleasure by the mere force of their incantations. Her eclipses, according to their opinion, proceeded from thence; and, on that account, it was usual to beat drums and cymbals, to ease her labours, and to render the power of magic less effectual. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 263, &c.—Tibull. 1, el. 8, v. 21.—Hesiod. Theog.—Virg. Ecl. 8, v. 69.

Lupa, (a she-wolf,) was held in great veneration at Rome, because Romulus and Remus, according to an ancient tradition, were suckled and preserved by one of these animals. This fabulous story arises from the surname of Lupa, which was given to the wife of the shepherd Faustulus, to whose care and humanity these children owed their preservation. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 415.—Plut. in Romul.

Lyæus, a surname of Bacchus. It is derived from λυειν, solvere, because wine, over which Bacchus presides, gives freedom to the mind, and delivers it from all cares and melancholy. Horat. ep. 9.—Lucan. 1, v. 675.

Lycaon, I. the first king of Arcadia, son of Pelasgus and Melibœa. He built a town called Lycosura on the top of mount Lycæus, in honour of Jupiter. He had many wives, by whom he had a daughter called Calisto, and fifty sons. He was succeeded on the throne by Nyctimus, the eldest of his sons. He lived about 1820 years before the Christian era. Apollod. 3.—Hygin. fab. 176.—Catul. ep. 76.—Paus. 8, c. 2, &c.——II. Another king of Arcadia, celebrated for his cruelties. He was changed into a wolf by Jupiter, because he offered human victims on the altars of the god Pan. Some attribute this metamorphosis to another cause. The sins of mankind, as they relate, were become so enormous, that Jupiter visited the earth to punish wickedness and impiety. He came to Arcadia, where the people began to pay proper adoration to his divinity. Lycaon, however, to try the divinity of the god, served up human flesh on his table. This impiety so irritated Jupiter, that he immediately destroyed the house of Lycaon, and changed him into a wolf. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 198, &c.—These two monarchs are often confounded together, though no less than an age elapsed between their reigns.——III. A son of Priam and Laothoe. He was taken by Achilles, and carried to Lemnos, whence he escaped. He was afterwards killed by Achilles in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 21, &c.

Lycastus, I. a son of Minos I. He was father of Minos II. by Ida, the daughter of Corybas. Diod. 4.——II. A son of Minos and Philonome, daughter of Nyctimus. He succeeded his father on the throne of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 3 and 4.

Lycius, an epithet given to Apollo from his temple in Lycia, where he gave oracles, particularly at Patara, where the appellation of Lyciæ sortes was given to his answers. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 346.

Lycomēdes, a king of Scyros, an island in the Ægean Sea, son of Apollo and Parthenope. He was secretly intrusted with the care of young Achilles, whom his mother Thetis had disguised in woman's clothes, to remove him from the Trojan war, where she knew he must unavoidably perish. Lycomedes has rendered himself famous for his treachery to Theseus. Plut. in Thes.—Paus. 1, c. 17, l. 7, c. 4.—Apol. 3, c. 13. Vid. Part II.

Lycurgus, a king of Thrace. He drove Bacchus out of his kingdom, and abolished his worship, for which impiety he was severely punished by the gods. He put his own son Dryas to death in a fury, and he cut off his own legs, mistaking them for vine boughs. He was put to death in the greatest torments by his subjects, who had been informed by the oracle that they should not taste wine till Lycurgus was no more. This fable is explained by observing, that the aversion of Lycurgus for wine, over which Bacchus presided, arose from the filthiness and disgrace of intoxication, and therefore the monarch wisely ordered all the vines of his dominions to be cut down, that himself and his subjects might be preserved from the extravagance and debauchery which are produced by too free a use of wine. Hygin. fab. 132.—Homer. Il. 6, v. 130.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 22.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 14.—Horat. 2, od. 19. Vid. Part II.

Lycus, I. a king of Bœotia, successor to his brother Nycteus, who left no male issue. He was intrusted with the government only during the minority of Labdacus, the son of the daughter of Nycteus. He was farther enjoined to make war against Epopeus, who had carried away by force Antiope, the daughter of Nycteus. He was successful in this expedition, recovered Antiope and married her. Vid. Antiope. Paus. 9, c. 5.—Apollod. 3. c. 5.——II. A king of Libya, who sacrificed whatever strangers came upon his coast. When Diomedes, at his return from the Trojan war, had been shipwrecked there, the tyrant seized him and confined him. He, however, escaped by means of Callirhoe, the tyrant's daughter, who was enamoured of him, and who hung herself when she saw herself deserted.——III. A son of Neptune by Celæno, made king of a part of Mysia by Hercules. He offered violence to Megara, the wife of Hercules, for which he was killed by the incensed hero. Lycus gave a kind reception to the Argonauts. Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Hygin. fab. 18, 31, 32, 137. Vid. Parts I. and II.

Lydus. Vid. Part II.

Lygodesma, a surname of Diana at Sparta, because her statue was brought by Orestes from Taurus, shielded round with osiers. Paus. 3, c. 16.

Lynceus, I. son of Aphareus, was among the hunters of the Calydonian boar, and one of the Argonauts. He was so sharpsighted, that, as it is reported, he could see through the earth. He stole some oxen with his brother Idas, and they were both killed by Castor and Pollux when they were going to celebrate their nuptials with the daughters of Leucippus. Apollod. 1 and 3.—Hygin. fab.—Paus. 4, c. 2.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 303.—Apollon. Arg. 1.——II. A son of Ægyptus, who married Hypermnestra, the daughter of Danaus. His life was spared by the love of his wife. Vid. Danaides. He made war against his father-in-law, dethroned him and seized his crown. Some say that Lynceus was reconciled to Danaus, and that he succeeded him after his death, and reigned forty-one years. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Paus. 2, c. 16, 19, 25. Ovid. Heroid. 14.

Lyncus, Lyncæus, or Lynx, a cruel king of Scythia, or, according to others, of Sicily. He received with feigned hospitality, Triptolemus, whom Ceres had sent all over the world to teach mankind agriculture; and as he was jealous of his commission, he resolved to murder this favourite of the gods in his sleep. As he was going to give the deadly blow to Triptolemus, he was suddenly changed into a lynx, an animal which is the emblem of perfidy and ingratitude. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 650.

Lysidice, a daughter of Pelops and Hippodamia, who married Mastor, the son of Perseus and Andromeda. Apol. 2, c. 4.—Paus. 8, c. 14.

M.

Macaria, I. a daughter of Hercules and Dejanira. After the death of Hercules, Eurystheus made war against the Heraclidæ, whom the Athenians supported, and the oracle declared that the descendants of Hercules should obtain the victory if any one of them devoted himself to death. This was cheerfully accepted by Macaria, who refused to endanger the life of the children of Hercules by suffering the victim to be drawn by lot, and the Athenians obtained a victory. Great honours were paid to the patriotic Macaria, and a fountain of Marathon was called by her name. Paus. 1, c. 32.——II. An ancient name of Cyprus.

Macedo, I. a son of Osiris, who had a share in the divine honours which were paid to his father. He was represented clothed in a wolf's skin, for which reason the Egyptians held that animal in great veneration. Diod. 1.—Plut. in Isid. et Os.——II. A man who gave his name to Macedonia. Some supposed him to be the same as the son or general of Osiris, whilst others considered him as the grandson of Deucalion by the mother's side. Diod. 1.

Machaon, a celebrated physician, son of Æsculapius and brother to Podalirus. He went to the Trojan war with the inhabitants of Trica, Ithome, and Œchalia. According to some, he was king of Messenia. As physician to the Greeks, he healed the wounds which they received during the Trojan war, and was one of those concealed in the wooden horse. Some suppose that he was killed before Troy by Eurypylus, the son of Telephus. He received divine honours after death, and had a temple in Messenia. Homer. Il. 2, &c.—Ovid. ex Pont. 3, ep. 4.—Quint. Smyr. 6, v. 409.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 263 and 426.

Mæonides, a name given to the Muses, because Homer, their greatest and worthiest favourite, was supposed to be a native of Mæonia.

Magnes, a young man, who found himself detained by the iron nails which were under his shoes as he walked over a stone mine. This was no other than the magnet, which received its name from the person who had been first sensible of its power. Some say that Magnes was a slave of Medea, whom that enchantress changed into a magnet. Orph. de lapid. 10, v. 7.

Maia, I. a daughter of Atlas and Pleione, mother of Mercury by Jupiter. She was one of the Pleiades, the most luminous of the seven sisters. Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 301.——II. A surname of Cybele.

Majestas, a goddess among the Romans, daughter of Honour and Reverence. Ovid. 5, Fast. 5, v. 25.

Mallophŏra, (lanam ferens,) a surname under which Ceres had a temple at Megara, because she had taught the inhabitants the utility of wool, and the means of tending sheep to advantage. This temple is represented as so old in the age of Pausanias, that it was falling to decay. Paus. 1, c. 44.

Manes, a name generally applied by the ancients to the souls when separated from the body. They were reckoned among the infernal deities, and generally supposed to preside over the burying places, and the monuments of the dead. They were worshipped with great solemnity, particularly by the Romans. The augurs always invoked them when they proceeded to exercise their sacerdotal offices. Virgil introduces his hero as sacrificing to the infernal deities, and to the Manes, a victim whose blood was received in a ditch. The word Manes is supposed to be derived from Mania, who was by some reckoned the mother of those tremendous deities. Others derive it from manare, quod per omnia æthereа terrenaque manabant, because they filled the air, particularly in the night, and were intent to molest and disturb the peace of mankind. Some say that manes comes from manis, an old Latin word which signified good or propitious. The word manes is differently used by ancient authors; sometimes it is taken for the infernal regions, and sometimes it is applied to the deities of Pluto's kingdom; whence the epitaphs of the Romans were always superscribed with D. M. Dis Manibus, to remind the sacrilegious and profane, not to molest the monuments of the dead, which were guarded with such sanctity. Propert. 1, el. 19.—Virg. 4, G. v. 469. Æn. 3, &c.—Horat. 1, Sat. 8, v. 28.

Mania, a goddess, supposed to be the mother of the Lares and Manes.

Mannus, the son of Tuisto, both famous divinities among the Germans. Tac. de Germ. c. 2.

Mantineus, the father of Ocalea, who married Abas the son of Lynceus and Hypermnestra. Apollod. 2, c. 9.

Manto, a daughter of the prophet Tiresias, endowed with the gift of prophecy. She was made prisoner by the Argives when the city of Thebes fell into their hands, and as she was the worthiest part of the booty, the conquerors sent her to Apollo, the god of Delphi, as the most valuable present they could make. Manto, often called Daphne, remained for some time at Delphi, where she officiated as priestess, and where she gave oracles. From Delphi she came to Claros, in Ionia, where she established an oracle of Apollo. Here she married Rhadius, the sovereign of the country, by whom she had a son called Mopsus. Manto afterwards visited Italy, where she married Tiberinus the king of Alba, or, as the poets mention, the god of the river Tiber. From this marriage sprang Ocnus, who built a town in the neighbourhood, which, in honour of his mother, he called Mantua. Manto, according to a certain tradition, was so struck at the misfortunes which afflicted Thebes, her native country, that she gave way to her sorrow and was turned into a fountain. Some suppose her to be the same who conducted Æneas into hell, and who sold the Sibylline books to Tarquin the Proud. She received divine honours after death. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 199, l. 10, v. 199.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 157.—Diod. 4.—Apol. 3, c. 7.—Strab. 14 and 16.—Paus. 9, c. 10 and 33, l. 7, c. 3.

Marianus, a surname given to Jupiter, from a temple built to his honour by Marius. It was in this temple that the Roman senate assembled to recall Cicero, a circumstance communicated to him in a dream. Val. Max. 1, c. 7.

Marica, a nymph of the river Liris, near Minturnæ. She married King Faunus, by whom she had King Latinus, and she was afterwards called Fauna and Fatua, and honoured as a goddess. A city of Campania bore her name. Some suppose her to be the same as Circe. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 47.—Liv. 27, c. 37.

Maron, I. a son of Evanthes, highpriest of Apollo, in Africa, when Ulysses touched upon the coast. Homer. Od. 9, v. 179.——II. An Egyptian who accompanied Osiris in his conquests, and built a city in Thrace, called from him Maronea. Mela, 2, c. 2.—Diod. 1.

Marpesia, a celebrated queen of the Amazons, who waged a successful war against the inhabitants of mount Caucasus. The mountain was called Marpesius Mons, from its female conqueror. Justin. 2, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6.

Marpessa, a daughter of the Evenus, who married Idas, by whom she had Cleopatra, the wife of Meleager. Marpessa was tenderly loved by her husband; and when Apollo endeavoured to carry her away, Idas followed the ravisher with a bow and arrows, resolved on revenge. Apollo and Idas were separated by Jupiter, who permitted Marpessa to go with that of the two lovers whom she most approved of. She returned to her husband. Homer. Il. 9, v. 549.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 305.—Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Paus. 4, c. 2, l. 5, c. 18.

Mars, a god of war among the ancients, was the son of Jupiter and Juno, according to Hesiod, Homer, and all the Greek poets, or of Juno alone, according to Ovid. Vid. Juno. The education of Mars was intrusted by Juno to the god Priapus, who instructed him in dancing and every manly exercise. His trial before the celebrated court of the Areopagus, according to the authority of some authors, for the murder of Hallirhotius, forms an interesting epoch in history. Vid. Areopagitæ. The amours of Mars and Venus are greatly celebrated. In the wars of Jupiter and the Titans, Mars was seized by Otus and Ephialtes, and confined for fifteen months, till Mercury procured him his liberty. His worship was not very universal among the ancients; his temples were not numerous in Greece, but in Rome he received the most unbounded honours, and the warlike Romans were proud of paying homage to a deity whom they esteemed as the patron of their city, and the father of the first of their monarchs. His most celebrated temple at Rome was built by Augustus after the battle of Philippi. It was dedicated to Mars ultor, or the avenger. His priests among the Romans were called Salii; they were first instituted by Numa. Mars was generally represented in the naked figure of an old man, armed with a helmet, a pike, and a shield. Sometimes he appeared in a military dress, and with a long flowing beard, and sometimes without. He generally rode in a chariot drawn by furious horses, which the poets call Flight and Terror. His altars were stained with the blood of the horse, on account of his warlike spirit, and of the wolf, on account of his ferocity. Magpies and vultures were also offered to him, on account of their greediness and voracity. The Scythians generally offered him asses, and the people of Caria, dogs. The weed called dog-grass was sacred to him, because it grows, as it is commonly reported, in places which are fit for fields of battle, or where the ground has been stained with the effusion of human blood. The surnames of Mars are not numerous. He was called Gradivus, Mavors, Quirinus, Salisubsulus, among the Romans. The Greeks called him Ares, and he was the Enyalus of the Sabines, the Camulus of the Gauls, and the Mamers of Carthage. Mars was father of Cupid, Anteros, and Harmonia, by the goddess Venus. He had Ascalaphus and Ialmenus by Astyoche; and Thestius, by Demonice, the daughter of Agenor. Besides these, he was the reputed father of Romulus, Œnomaus, &c. He presided over gladiators, and was the god of hunting, and of whatever exercises or amusements have something manly and warlike. Among the Romans it was usual for the consul, before he went on an expedition, to visit the temple of Mars, where he offered his prayers, and in a solemn manner shook the spear which was in the hand of the statue of the god, at the same time exclaiming, "Mars viliga! god of war, watch over the safety of this city." *Ovid. MARSYAS, a celebrated piper of Celænæ in Phrygia, son of Olympus, or of Hyagnis, or Eagrus. He was so skilful in playing on the flute, that he is generally deemed the inventor of it. According to the opinion of some he found it when Minerva had thrown it aside on account of the distortion of her face when she played upon it. Marsyas was enamoured of Cybele, and he travelled with her as far as Nysa, where he had the imprudence to challenge Apollo to a trial of his skill as a musician. The god accepted the challenge, and it was mutually agreed that he who was defeated should be flayed alive by the conqueror. The Muses, or, according to Diodorus, the inhabitants of Nysa, were appointed umpires. Each exerted his utmost skill, and the victory, with much difficulty, was adjudged to Apollo. The god, upon this, tied his antagonist to a tree and flayed him alive. The death of Marsyas was universally lamented; the Fauns, Satyrs, and Dryads, wept at his fate, and from their abundant tears arose a river of Phrygia, well known by the name of Marsyas. In independent cities among the ancients the statue of Marsyus was generally erected in the forum, to represent the intimacy which subsisted between Bacchus and Marsyas, as the emblems of liberty. It was also erected at the entrance of the Roman forum, as a spot where usurers and merchants resorted to transact business, being principally intended in terrorem litigatorum; a circumstance to which Horace seems to allude, 1 Sat. 6, v. 120. At Celænæ, the skin of Marsyas was shown to travellers for some time; it was suspended in the public place in the form of a bladder or a foot-ball. Hygin. fab 165.—*Ovid. MATUTA, a deity among the Romans, the same as the Leucothoe of the Greeks. She was originally Ino, who was changed into a sea deity, (Vid. Ino and Leucothoe,) and she was worshipped by sailors as such at Corinth in a temple sacred to Neptune. Only married women and freeborn matrons were permitted to enter her temples at Rome, where they generally brought the children of their relations in their arms. Liv. 5, &c.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, v. 19.

MECHANEUS, a surname of Jupiter. He had a statue near the temple of Ceres at Argos, and there the people swore, before they went to the Trojan war, either to conquer or to perish. Paus. 2, c. 22.

MECISTEUS, I. a son of Echius or Talaus, was one of the companions of Ajax. He was killed by Polydamas. Homer. Il. 6, v. 28, &c.——II. A son of Lycaon. Apollod.

MEDEA, a celebrated magician, daughter of Æetes, king of Colchis. Her mother's name, according to the more received opinion of Hesiod and Hyginus, was Idyia, or, according to others, Ephyre, Hecate, Asterodia, Antiope, and Neræa. She was the niece of Circe. When Jason came to Colchis in quest of the golden fleece, Meda became enamoured of him, and it was to her well-directed labours that the Argonauts owed their preservation. Vid. Argonautæ. When Jason reached Iolchos, his native country, the return and victories of the Argonauts were celebrated with universal rejoicings; but Æson, the father of Jason, was unable to assist at the solemnity on account of the infirmities of his age. Medea, at her husband's request, removed the weakness of Æson, and by drawing away the blood from his veins and filling them again with the juice of certain herbs, she restored to him the vigour and sprightliness of youth. The daughters of Pelias were also desirous to see their father restored by the same power. They accordingly killed him of their own accord, and boiled his flesh in a caldron, but Meda refused to perform the same friendly offices to Pelias which he had done to Æson, and he was consumed by the heat of the fire, and even deprived of a burial. This action greatly irritated the people of Iolchos, and Medea, with her husband, fled to Corinth to avoid the resentment of an offended populace. Here they lived for ten years with much conjugal tenderness; but the love of Jason for Glauce, the king's daughter, soon interrupted their mutual harmony, and Medea was divorced. Medea revenged the infidelity of Jason by causing the death of Glauce and the destruction of her family. Vid. Glauce. This action was followed by another still more atrocious. Medea killed two of her children in their father's presence, and when Jason attempted to punish the barbarity of the mother, she fled through the air upon a chariot drawn by winged dragons. From Corinth, Medea came to Athens, where, after she had undergone the necessary purification of her murder, she married king Ægeus, and gave birth to a son who was called Medus. Soon after, when Theseus wished to make himself known to his father, (Vid. Ægeus,) Medea, jealous of his fame and fearful of his power, attempted to poison him at a feast which had been prepared for his entertainment. Her attempts, however, failed of success, and the sight of the sword, which Theseus wore by his side, convinced Ægeus that the stranger, against whose life he had so basely conspired, was no less than his own son. The father and the son were reconciled, and Medea, to avoid the punishment which her wickedness deserved, mounted her fiery chariot, and disappeared through the air. She came to Colchis, where according to some, she was reconciled to Jason, who had sought her in her native country after her sudden departure from Corinth. She died at Colchis, as Justin mentions, when she had been restored to the confidence of her family. After death, she married Achilles in the Elysian fields, according to the traditions mentioned by Simonides. The murder of Mermerus and Pheres, the youngest of Jason's children by Medea, is not attributed to their mother, according to Ælian, but the Corinthians themselves assassinated them in the temple of Juno Acræa. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Hygin. fab. 21, 22, 23, &c.—Plut. in Thes.—*Dionys. Medesicaste, a daughter of Priam, who married Imbrius, son of Mentor, who was killed by Teucer during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 13, v. 172.—Apollod. 3.

Meditrina, the goddess of medicine, whose festivals, called Meditrinalia, were celebrated at Rome the last day of September, when they made offerings of fruits. Varro de L. L. 5, c. 3.

Medusa, I. one of the three Gorgons, daughter of Phorcys and Ceto. She was the only one of the Gorgons who was subject to mortality. She is celebrated for her personal charms and the beauty of her locks. Neptune became enamoured of her, and obtained her favours in the temple of Minerva. This violation of the sanctity of the temple provoked Minerva, and she changed the beautiful locks of Medusa, which had inspired Neptune's love, into serpents. According to Apollodorus and others, Medusa and her sisters came into the world with snakes on their heads instead of hair, with yellow wings and brazen heads. Their body was also covered with impenetrable scales, and their very looks had the power of killing or turning to stones. Perseus rendered his name immortal by the conquest of Medusa. He cut off her head, and the blood that dropped from the wound produced the innumerable serpents that infest Africa. The conqueror placed Medusa's head on the ægis of Minerva, which he had used in his expedition. The head still retained the same petrifying power as before, as it was fatally known in the court of Cepheus. Vid. Andromeda. Some suppose that the Gorgons were a nation of women, whom Perseus conquered. Vid. Gorgones. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Hesiod. Theog.—*Ovid. Megæra, one of the Furies, daughter of Nox and Acheron. The name is derived from μεγαιρειν invidere, and she is represented as employed by the gods like her sisters to punish the crimes of mankind, by visiting them with diseases, with inward torments, and with death. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 846. Vid. Eumenides.

Megale, the Greek name of Cybele, the mother of the gods, whose festivals were called Megalesia.

Meganira, the wife of Celeus, king of Eleusis, in Attica. She was mother to Triptolemus, to whom Ceres, as she travelled over Attica, taught agriculture. She received divine honours after death, and she had an altar raised to her, near the fountain where Ceres had first been seen when she arrived at Attica. Paus. 1, c. 39.

Megara, the daughter of Creon, king of Thebes, given in marriage to Hercules because he had delivered the Thebans from the tyranny of the Orchomenians. Vid. Ergimus. When Hercules went to hell by order of Eurystheus, violence was offered to Megara by Lycus, a Theban exile, and she would have yielded to her ravisher, had not Hercules returned that moment and punished him with death. This murder displeased Juno, and she rendered Hercules so delirious, that he killed Megara and the three children he had by her in a fit of madness, thinking them to be wild beasts. Some say that Megara did not perish by the hand of her husband, but that he afterwards married her to his friend Iolas. The names of Megara's children by Hercules were Creontiades, Therimachus, and Deicoon. Hygin. fab. 82.—Senec. in Herc.—Apollod. 2, c. 6.—Diod. 4.

Melampus, a celebrated soothsayer and physician of Argos, son of Amythaon, and Idomenea, or Dorippe. He lived at Pylos, in Peloponnesus. His servants once killed two large serpents who had made their nests at the bottom of a large oak, and Melampus paid so much regard to these two reptiles, that he raised a burning pile and burned them upon it. He also took particular care of their young ones, and fed them with milk. Some time after this the young serpents crept to Melampus as he slept on the grass near the oak; and, as if sensible of the favours of their benefactor, they wantonly played around him, and softly licked his scars. This awoke Melampus, who was astonished at the sudden change which his senses had undergone. He found himself acquainted with the chirping of the birds, and with all their rude notes as they flew around him. He took advantage of this supernatural gift, and soon made himself perfect in the knowledge of futurity, and Apollo also instructed him in the art of medicine. He had soon after the happiness of curing the daughters of Prœtus, by giving them ellebore, which, from this circumstance, has been called melampodium, and as a reward for his trouble he married the eldest of these princesses. Vid. Prœtides. The tyranny of his uncle Neleus, king of Pylos, obliged him to leave his native country, and Prœtus, to show himself more sensible of his services, gave him part of his kingdom, over which he established himself. About this time the personal charms of Pero, the daughter of Neleus, had gained many admirers, but the father promised his daughter only to him who brought into his hands the oxen of Iphiclus. Bias, who was also one of her admirers, engaged his brother Melampus to steal the oxen, and deliver them to him. Melampus was caught in the attempt and imprisoned; but he taught the childless Iphiclus how to become a father, and not only obtained his liberty, but also the oxen, and with them he compelled Neleus to give Pero in marriage to Bias. A severe distemper, which had rendered the women of Argos insane, was totally removed by Melampus; and Anaxagoras, who then sat on the throne, rewarded his merit by giving him part of his kingdom, where he established himself, and where his posterity reigned during six successive generations. He received divine honours after death, and temples were raised to his memory. Homer. Od. 11, v. 287, l. 15, v. 255.—Herodot. 2 and 9.—Apollod. 2, c. 2.—Paus. 2, c. 18, l. 4, c. 3.—Virg. G. 3, v. 550.

Melampygus, a surname of Hercules, from the black and hairy appearance of his back, &c.

Melanippe, I. a daughter of Æolus, who had two children by Neptune, for which her father put out both her eyes, and confined her in a prison. Her children, who had been exposed and preserved, delivered her from confinement, and Neptune restored her to her eyesight. She afterwards married Metapontus. Hygin. fab. 186.——II. A nymph who married Itonus, son of Amphictyon, by whom she had Bœotus, who gave his name to Bœotia. Paus. 9, c. 1.

Melanippus, I. a priest of Apollo, at Cyrene, killed by the tyrant Nicocrates. Polyæn. 8.——II. A son of Astacus, one of the Theban chiefs who defended the gates of Thebes against the army of Adrastus, king of Argos, and was killed by Amphiaraus. Vid. Tydeus. Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Æschyl. ante Theb.—Paus. 9, c. 18.——III. A son of Mars, who became enamoured of Cometho, a priestess of Diana Triclaria. For violation of the sanctity of the place, the two lovers soon after perished by a sudden death, and the country was visited by a pestilence, which was stopped only after the offering of a human sacrifice by the direction of the oracle. Paus. 7, c. 19.

Meleager, a celebrated hero of antiquity, son of Œneus, king of Ætolia, by Althæa, daughter of Thestius. The Parcæ were present at the moment of his birth, and predicted his future greatness. Clotho said, that he would be brave and courageous; Lachesis foretold his uncommon strength, and Atropos declared that he should live as long as that firebrand, which was on the fire, remained entire and unconsumed. Althæa no sooner heard this than she snatched the stick from the fire, and kept it with the most jealous care, as the life of her son was destined to depend upon its preservation. The fame of Meleager increased with his years; he signalized himself in the Argonautic expedition, and afterwards delivered his country from the neighbouring inhabitants, who made war against his father, at the instigation of Diana, whose altars Œneus had neglected. Vid. Œneus. No sooner were they destroyed, than Diana punished the negligence of Œneus by a greater calamity. She sent a huge wild boar, which laid waste all the country, and seemed invincible on account of its immense size. It became soon a public concern, all the neighbouring princes assembled to destroy this terrible animal, and nothing became more famous in mythological history than the hunting of the Calydonian boar. The princes and chiefs who assembled, and who are mentioned by mythologists, are Meleager, son of Œneus, Idas and Lynceus, sons of Aphareus, Dryas son of Mars, Castor and Pollux sons of Jupiter and Leda, Pirithous son of Ixion, Thesus son of Ægeus, Anceus and Cepheus sons of Lycurgus, Admetus son of Pheres, Jason son of Æson, Peleus and Telemon sons of Æacus, Iphicles son of Amphitryon, Eurytrion son of Actor, Atalanta daughter of Schœneus, Iolas the friend of Hercules, the sons of Thestius, Amphiaraus son of Oileus, Protheus, Cometes, the brothers of Althæa, Hippothous son of Cereyon, Leucippus, Adrastus, Ceneus, Phileus, Echeon, Lelex, Phœnix son of Amyntor, Panopeus, Hyleus, Hippasus, Nestor, Menœtius, the father of Patroclus, Amphicides, Laertes the father of Ulysses, and the four sons of Hippocoon. This troop of armed men attacked the boar with unusual fury, and it was at last killed by Meleager. The conqueror gave the skin and the head to Atalanta, who had first wounded the animal. This partiality to a woman irritated the others, and particularly Toxeus and Plexippus, the brothers of Althæa, and they endeavoured to rob Atalanta of the honourable present. Meleager defended a woman of whom he was enamoured, and killed his uncles in the attempt. Meantime, the news of this celebrated conquest had already reached Calydon, and Althæa went to the temple of the gods to return thanks for the victory which her son had gained. As she went, she met the corpses of her brothers that were brought from the chase, and at this mournful spectacle she filled the whole city with her lamentations. She was upon this informed that they had been killed by Meleager, and in the moment of her resentment, to revenge the death of her brothers, she threw into the fire the fatal stick on which her son's life depended, and Meleager died as soon as it was consumed. Homer does not mention the firebrand, whence some have imagined that this fable is posterior to that poet's age. But he says that the death of Toxeus and Plexippus so irritated Althæa, that she uttered the most horrible curses and imprecations upon the head of her son. Meleager married Cleopatra, the daughter of Idas and Marpessa, as also Atalanta, according to some accounts. Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Apollon. 1, arg. 1, v. 997, l. 3, v. 518.—Flacc. 1 and 6.—Paus. 10, c. 31.—Hygin. 14.—*Ovid. MĔLEĂGRIDES, the sisters of Meleager, daughters of Œneus and Althæa. They were so disconsolate at the death of their brother Meleager, that they refused all aliment, and were changed into birds called Meleagrides. The youngest of the sisters, Gorge and Dejanira, who had been married, escaped this metamorphosis. Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 540.—Plin. 10, c. 26.

MĔLĪCERTA, MELICERTES, or MELICERTUS, a son of Athamas and Ino. Vid. Athamas. After his transformation, Melicerta was known among the Greeks by the name of Palæmon, and among the Latins by that of Portumnus. Some suppose that the Isthmian games were in honour of him. Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 4.—Paus. 1, c. 44.—Hygin. fab. 1 and 2.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 529, &c.—Plut. de Symp.

MELISSA, I. a daughter of Melissus, king of Crete, who, with her sister Amalthæa, fed Jupiter with the milk of goats. She first found out the means of collecting honey; whence some have imagined that she was changed into a bee, as her name is the Greek word for that insect. Columell.——II. One of the Oceanides, who married Inachus, by whom she had Phoroneus and Ægialus. Vid. Part II.

MELPŎMĔNE, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over tragedy. Horace has addressed the finest of his odes to her, as to the patroness of lyric poetry. Her garments were splendid; she wore a buskin, and held a dagger in one hand, and in the other a sceptre and crowns. Horat. 3, od. 4.—Hesiod. Theog.

MEMNON, a king of Æthiopia, son of Tithonus and Aurora. He came with a body of ten thousand men to assist his uncle Priam during the Trojan war, where he behaved with great courage, and killed Antilochus, Nestor's son. The aged father challenged the Æthiopian monarch, but Memnon refused it on account of the venerable age of Nestor, and accepted that of Achilles. He was killed in the combat in the sight of the Grecian and Trojan armies. Aurora was so disconsolate at the death of her son, that she flew to Jupiter, all bathed in tears, and begged the god to grant her son such honours as might distinguish him from other mortals. Jupiter consented, and immediately a numerous flight of birds issued from the burning pile on which the body was laid, and after they had flown three times round the flames, they divided themselves into two separate bodies, and fought with such acrimony that above half of them fell down into the fire as victims to appease the manes of Memnon. These birds were called Memnonides; and it has been observed by some of the ancients, that they never failed to return yearly to the tomb of Memnon in Troas, and repeat the same bloody engagement, in honour of the hero from whom they received their name. The Æthiopians or Egyptians, over whom Memnon reigned, erected a celebrated statue to the honour of their monarch. This statue had the wonderful property of uttering a melodious sound every day, at sun-rising, like that which is heard at the breaking of the string of a harp when it is wound up. This was effected by the rays of the sun when they fell upon it. At the setting of the sun, and in the night, the sound was lugubrious. This is supported by the testimony of the geographer Strabo, who confesses himself ignorant whether it proceeded from the basis of the statue, or the people that were then round it. This celebrated statue was dismantled by order of Cambyses, when he conquered Egypt, and its ruins still astonish modern travellers by their grandeur and beauty. Memnon was the inventor of the alphabet, according to Anticlides, a writer mentioned by Pliny, 7, c. 56. Mosch. in Bion.—*Ovid. MENA, a goddess worshipped at Rome, and supposed to preside over women. She was the same as Juno. According to some, the sacrifices offered to her were young puppies that still sucked their mother. Aug. de Civ. D. 4, c. 2—Plin. 29, c. 4.

MENALIPPE, I. a sister of Antiope, queen of the Amazons, taken by Hercules when that hero made war against this celebrated nation. She was ransomed, and Hercules received in exchange the arms and belt of the queen. Juv. 8, v. 229.——II. A daughter of the centaur Chiron, beloved by Æolus, son of Hellen. She was changed into a mare, and called Ocyroe. Some suppose that she assumed the name of Menalippe, and lost that of Ocyroe. She became a constellation after death, called the horse. Some authors call her Hippe or Evippe. Hygin. P. A. 2, c. 18.—Pollux. 4.——Menalippe is a name common to other persons, but it is generally spelt Melanippe by the best authors.—*Vid. MENŒCEUS, I. a Theban, father of Hipponome, Jocasta, and Creon.——II. A young Theban, son of Creon. He offered himself to death, when Teresias, to insure victory on the side of Thebes against the Argive forces, ordered the Thebans to sacrifice one of the descendants of those who sprang from the dragon's teeth, and he killed himself near the cave where the dragon of Mars had formerly resided. The gods required this sacrifice because the dragon had been killed by Cadmus, and no sooner was Menœceus dead, than his countrymen obtained the victory. Stat. Theb. 10, v. 614.—*Eurip. MENŒTIUS, a son of Actor and Æginia. He left his mother and went to Opus, where he had, by Sthenele, or, according to others, by Philomela or Polymela, Patroclus, often called from him Menœtides. Menœtius was one of the Argonauts. Apollod. 3, c. 24.—Homer. Il. 1, v. 307.—Hygin. fab. 97.

Mera, a dog of Icarius, who, by his cries, showed Erigone where her murdered father had been thrown. Immediately after this discovery, the daughter hung herself in despair, and the dog pined away, and was made a constellation in the heavens, known by the name of Canis. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 363.—Hygin. fab. 130.—Ælian. Hist. An. 7, c. 28.

Mercurius, a celebrated god of antiquity, called Hermes by the Greeks. There were no less than five of this name according to Cicero: a son of Cœlus and Lux; a son of Valens and Coronis; a son of the Nile; a son of Jupiter and Maia; and another, called by the Egyptians Thaut. Some add a sixth, a son of Bacchus and Proserpine. To the son of Jupiter and Maia the actions of all the others have been probably attributed, as he is the most famous and the best known. Mercury was the messenger of the gods, and of Jupiter in particular; he was the patron of travellers and of shepherds; he conducted the souls of the dead into the infernal regions; and not only presided over orators, merchants, declaimers, but he was also the god of thieves, pickpockets, and all dishonest persons. His name is derived a mercibus, because he was the god of merchandise among the Latins. He was born, according to the more received opinion, in Arcadia, on mount Cyllene, and in his infancy he was intrusted to the care of the Seasons. The day that he was born, or, more probably, the following day, he gave an early proof of his craftiness and dishonesty, in stealing away the oxen of Admetus which Apollo tended. He gave another proof of his thievish propensity, by taking also the quiver and arrows of the divine shepherd; and he increased his fame by robbing Neptune of his trident, Venus of her girdle, Mars of his sword, Jupiter of his sceptre, and Vulcan of many of his mechanical instruments. Those specimens of his art recommended him to the notice of the gods, and Jupiter took him as his messenger, interpreter, and cup-bearer in the assembly of the gods. This last office he discharged till the promotion of Ganymede. He was presented by the king of heaven with a wing cap called pelasus, and with wings for his feet called talaria. He had also a short sword, called herpe, which he lent to Perseus. He was the confidant of Jupiter's amours, and he often was set to watch over the jealousy and intrigues of Juno. The invention of the lyre and its seven strings is ascribed to him. This he gave to Apollo, and received in exchange the celebrated caduceus with which the god of poetry used to drive the flocks of King Admetus. Vid. Caduceus. In the wars of the giants against the gods, Mercury showed himself spirited, brave and active. He delivered Mars from the long confinement which he suffered from the superior power of the Aloides. He purified the Danaides of the murder of their husband; he tied Ixion to his wheel in the infernal regions; he destroyed the hundred-eyed Argus; he sold Hecrules to Omphale, the queen of Lydia; he conducted Priam to the tent of Achilles, to redeem the body of his son Hector; and he carried the infant Bacchus to the nymphs of Nysa. Mercury had many surnames and epithets. He was called Cyllenius, Tricephalos, Agoneus, &c. His children are also numerous as well as his amours. He was father of Autolycus, by Chione; Cephalus, by Creusa; and of Priapus, according to some. He was also father of Hermaphroditus, by Venus; of Pan, by Dryope, or Penelope. His worship was well established, particularly in Greece, Egypt, and Italy. He was worshipped at Tanagra, in Bœotia, under the name of Criophorus, and represented as carrying a ram on his shoulders, because he delivered the inhabitants from a pestilence by telling them to carry a ram in that manner round the walls of their city. The Roman merchants yearly celebrated a festival, on the 15th of May, in honour of Mercury, in a temple near the Circus Maximus. A pregnant sow was then sacrificed, and sometimes a calf; and particularly the tongues of animals were offered. After the votaries had sprinkled themselves with water with laurel leaves, they offered prayers to the divinity, and entreated him to be favourable to them, and to forgive whatever artful measures, false oaths, or falsehoods, they had used or uttered in the pursuit of gain. Sometimes Mercury appears on monuments with a large cloak round his arm, or tied under his chin. The chief ensigns of his power and offices are his caduceus, his petasus, and his talaria. In Egypt, his statues represented him with the head of a dog; whence he was often confounded with Anubis, and received the sacrifice of a stork. Offerings of milk and honey were made because he was the god of eloquence, whose powers were sweet and persuasive. The Greeks and Romans offered tongues to him by throwing them into the fire, as he was the patron of speaking, of which the tongue is the organ. Sometimes his statues represent him as without arms, because, according to some, the power of speech can prevail over every thing, even without the assistance of arms. *Homer. Mĕriŏnes. Vid. Part II.

Merŏpe, one of the Atlantides. She married Sisyphus, son of Æolus, and, like her sisters, was changed into a constellation after death. Vid. Pleiades. It is said that in the constellation of the Pleiades the star of Merope appears more dim and obscure than the rest, because she, as the poets observe, married a mortal, while her sisters married some of the gods or their descendants. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 175.—Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 192.—Apollod. 1, c. 9. Vid. Part II.

Mestor, I. a son of Perseus and Andromeda, who married Lysidice, daughter of Pelops, by whom he had Hippothoe.——II. A son of Pterilaus.

Metanira, the wife of Celeus, king of Eleusis, who first taught mankind agriculture. She is also called Meganira. Apollod. 1, c. 5.

Metiadusa, a daughter of Eupalamus, who married Cecrops, by whom she had Pandion. Apollod. 3, c. 15.

Metis, one of the Oceanides. She was Jupiter's first wife, celebrated for her great prudence and sagacity above the rest of the gods. Jupiter, who was afraid lest she should bring forth into the world a child more cunning and greater than himself, devoured her in the first month of her pregnancy. Some time after this adventure, the god had his head opened, from which issued Minerva, armed from head to foot. Hesiod. Theog. v. 890.—Hygin.

Midas, a king of Phrygia, son of Gordius or Gorgias. The hospitality he showed to Silenus, the preceptor of Bacchus, who had been brought to him by some peasants, was liberally rewarded; and Midas was permitted to choose whatever recompense he pleased. He demanded of the god that whatever he touched might be turned into gold. His prayer was granted; and when the very meats which he attempted to eat became gold in his mouth, he begged Bacchus to take away a present which must prove so fatal to the receiver. He was ordered to wash himself in the river Pactolus, whose sands were turned into gold by the touch of Midas. Some time after this adventure, Midas had the imprudence to support that Pan was superior to Apollo in singing and in playing upon the flute; for which rash opinion the offended god changed his ears into those of an ass, to show his ignorance and stupidity. This, Midas attempted to conceal from the knowledge of his subjects, but one of his servants saw the length of his ears, and being unable to keep the secret, and afraid to reveal it, apprehensive of the king's resentment, he opened a hole in the earth, and after he had whispered there that Midas had the ears of an ass, he covered the place as before, as if he had buried his words in the ground. On that place, as the poets mention, grew a number of reeds, which, when agitated by the wind, uttered the same sound that had been buried beneath, and published to the world that Midas had the ears of an ass. Some explain the fable of the ears of Midas, by the supposition that he kept a number of informers and spies, who were continually employed in gathering every seditious word that might drop from the mouths of his subjects. Midas, according to Strabo, died of drinking bull's hot blood. This he did, as Plutarch mentions, to free himself from the numerous ill dreams which continually tormented him. Midas, according to some, was son of Cybele. He built a town which he called Ancyræ. Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 5.—Plut. de Superst. —Strab. 1.—Hygin. fab. 191, 274.—*Max. Milanion, I. a youth who became enamoured of Atalanta. He is supposed by some to be the same as Meleager or Hippomanes. Ovid. Art. Am. 2, v. 188.——II. A son of Amphidamas.

Milesius, a surname of Apollo.

Miletus, a son of Apollo, who fled from Crete to avoid the wrath of Minos, whom he meditated to dethrone. He came to Caria, where he built a city which he called by his own name. Some suppose that he only conquered a city there called Anactoria, which assumed his name. They farther say, that he put the inhabitants to the sword, and divided the women among his soldiers. Cranea, a daughter of the Mæander, fell to his share. Strab. 14.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 446.—Paus. 7, c. 2.—Apollod. 3, c. 1.

Minëides, the daughters of Minyas or Mineus, king of Orchomenos, in Bœotia. They were three in number, Leuconoe, Leucippe, and Alcithoe. Ovid calls the two first Clymene and Iris. They derided the orgies of Bacchus, for which impiety the god inspired them with an unconquerable desire of eating human flesh. They drew lots which of them should give up her son as food to the rest. The lot fell upon Leucippe, and she gave up her son Hippasus, who was instantly devoured by the three sisters. They were changed into bats. In commemoration of the bloody crime, it was usual among the Orchomenians for the high-priest, as soon as the sacrifice was finished, to pursue, with a drawn sword, all the women who had entered the temple, and even to kill the first he came up to. Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 12.—Plut. Quæst. Gr. 38.

Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, war, and all the liberal arts, was produced from Jupiter's brain without a mother. The power of Minerva was great in heaven; she could hurl the thunders of Jupiter, prolong the life of men, bestow the gift of prophecy; and, indeed, she was the only one of all the divinities whose authority and consequence were equal to those of Jupiter. Her quarrel with Neptune, concerning the right of giving a name to the capital of Cecropia, deserves attention. The assembly of the gods settled the dispute, by promising the preference to whichever of the two gave the most useful and necessary present to the inhabitants of the earth. Neptune, upon this, struck the ground with his trident, and immediately a horse issued from the earth. Minerva produced the olive, and obtained the victory by the unanimous voice of the gods, who observed that the olive, as the emblem of peace, is far preferable to the horse, the symbol of war and bloodshed. The victorious deity called the capital Athenæ, and became the tutelar goddess of the place. The attempts of Vulcan to offer her violence proved ineffectual, and her chastity was not violated, though the god left on her body the marks of his passion. Minerva was the first who built a ship, and it was her zeal for navigation, and her care for the Argonauts, which placed the prophetic tree of Dodona behind the ship Argo when going to Colchis. She was known among the ancients by many names. She was called Athena, Pallas, (Vid. Pallas,) Parthenos, from her remaining in perpetual celibacy; Tritonia, because worshipped near the lake Triton; Glaucopis, from the blueness of her eyes; Argorea, from her presiding over markets; Hippia, because she first taught mankind how to manage the horse; Stratea and Area, from her martial character; Coryphagenes, because born from Jupiter's brain; Sais, because worshipped at Sais, &c. Some attributed to her the invention of the flute, whence she was surnamed Andon, Luscinia, Musica, Salpiga, &c. She, as it is reported, once amused herself in playing upon her favourite flute before Juno and Venus, but the goddesses ridiculed the distortion of her face in blowing the instrument. Minerva, convinced of the justness of their remarks by looking at herself in a fountain near mount Ida, threw away the musical instrument, and denounced a melancholy death to him who found it. Vid. Marsyas. The worship of Minerva was universally established; she had magnificent temples in Egypt, Phœnicia, all parts of Greece, Italy, Gaul, and Sicily. Sais, Rhodes, and Athens, particularly claimed her attention; and it is even said that Jupiter rained a shower of gold upon the island of Rhodes, which had paid so much veneration and such an early reverence to the divinity of his daughter. The festivals celebrated in her honour were solemn and magnificent. Vid. Panathenæa. She was invoked by every artist, and particularly such as worked in wood, embroidery, painting, and sculpture. It was the duty of almost every member of society to implore the assistance and patronage of a deity who presided over sense, taste, and reason. Hence the poets have had occasion to say:—

Qui bene placârit Pallade, doctus erit.

Minerva was represented in different ways, according to the different characters in which she appeared. She generally appeared with a countenance full more of masculine firmness and composure than of softness and grace. In one hand she held a spear, and in the other a shield, with the dying head of Medusa upon it. Sometimes, this Gorgon's head was on her breastplate, with living serpents writhing round it, as well as round her shield and helmet. In most of her statues she is represented as sitting, and sometimes she holds in one hand a distaff instead of a spear. When she appeared as the goddess of the liberal arts, she was arrayed in a variegated veil, which the ancients called peplum. Some of her statues represented her helmet with a sphinx in the middle, supported on either side by griffins. In some medals, a chariot drawn by four horses, or sometimes a dragon or a serpent, with winding spires, appear at the top of her helmet. She was partial to the olive tree; the owl and the cock were her favourite birds, and the dragon, among reptiles, was sacred to her. The functions, offices, and actions of Minerva, seem so numerous, that they undoubtedly originate in more than one person. Cicero speaks of five persons of this name; a Minerva, mother of Apollo; a daughter of the Nile, who was worshipped at Sais, in Egypt; a third, born from Jupiter's brain; a fourth, daughter of Jupiter and Coryphe; and a fifth, daughter of Pallas, generally represented with winged shoes. This last put her father to death because he attempted her virtue. Paus. 2, 3, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 16, l. 3, od. 4.—Virg. Æn. 2, &c.—Strab. 6, 9 and 13.—Philost. Icon.—*Ovid. Minos, a king of Crete, son of Jupiter and Europa, who gave laws to his subjects B. C. 1406, which still remained in full force in the age of the philosopher Plato. His justice and moderation procured him the appellation of the favourite of the gods, the confidant of Jupiter, the wise legislator, in every city of Greece; and, according to the poets, he was rewarded for his equity after death, with the office of supreme and absolute judge in the infernal regions. In this capacity, he is represented sitting in the middle of the shades, and holding a sceptre in his hand. The dead plead their different causes before him, and the impartial judge shakes the fatal urn, which is filled with the destinies of mankind. He married Ithona, by whom he had Lycastes, who was the father of Minos 2d. Homer. Od. 19, v. 178.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 432.—Apollod. 3, c. 1.—Hygin. fab. 41.—Diod. 4.—Horat. 1, od. 28.——The 2d was a son of Lycastes, the son of Minos I. a king of Crete. He married Pasiphae, the daughter of Sol and Perseis, and by her he had many children. He increased his paternal dominions by the conquest of the neighbouring islands; but he showed himself cruel in the war which he carried on against the Athenians, who had put to death his son Androgeus. Vid. Androgeus. He took Megara by the treachery of Scylla, (Vid. Scylla,) and, not satisfied with a victory, he obliged the vanquished to bring him yearly to Crete seven chosen boys and the same number of virgins, to be devoured by the Minotaur. Vid. Minotaurus. This bloody tribute was at last abolished when Theseus destroyed the monster. Vid. Theseus. When Dædalus, whose industry and invention had fabricated the labyrinth, and whose imprudence in assisting Pasiphae, in the gratification of her unnatural desires, had offended Minos, fled from the place of his confinement with wings, (Vid. Dædalus,) and arrived safe in Sicily, the incensed monarch pursued the offender, resolved to punish his infidelity. Cocalus, king of Sicily, who had hospitably received Dædalus, entertained his royal guest with dissembled friendship; and that he might not deliver to him a man whose ingenuity and abilities he so well knew, he put Minos to death. Some say that it was the daughters of Cocalus who put the king of Crete to death, by detaining him so long in a bath till he fainted, after which they suffocated him. Minos died about 35 years before the Trojan war. He was father of Androgeus, Glaucus, and Deucalion, and two daughters Phædra and Ariadne. Many authors have confounded the two monarchs of this name, the grandfather and the grandson; but Homer, Plutarch, and Diodorus, prove plainly that they were two different persons. Paus. in Ach. 4.—Plut. in Thes.—Hygin. fab. 41.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 141.—Diod. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 21.—Plut. in Min.—Athen. Flacc. 14.

Minotaurus, a celebrated monster, half a man

Semibovemque virum, semivirumque bovem.

It was the fruit of Pasiphae's amours. Minos confined in the labyrinth a monster which convinced the world of his wife's lasciviousness, and reflected disgrace upon his family. The Minotaur usually devoured the chosen young men and maidens whom the tyranny of Minos yearly exacted from the Athenians. Theseus delivered his country from this shameful tribute, when it had fallen to his lot to be sacrificed to the voracity of the Minotaur, and, by means of Ariadne, the king's daughter, he destroyed the monster, and made his escape from the windings of the labyrinth. Some suppose that Pasiphae was enamoured of one of her husband's courtiers, called Taurus, and, some time after, brought twins into the world, one of whom greatly resembled Minos and the other Taurus. In the natural resemblance of their countenance with that of their supposed fathers originated their name, and consequently the fable of the Minotaur. Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 2.—Hygin. fab. 40.—Plut. in Thes.—Palæphat.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 26.

Mintha, a daughter of Cocytus, loved by Pluto. Proserpine discovered her husband's amour, and changed his mistress into an herb called by the same name, mint. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 729.

Minyas, a king of Bœotia, son of Neptune and Tritegonia, of Neptune and Callirhoe, or of Chryses, Neptune's son, and Chrysogenia, the daughter of Halmus. He married Clytodora, by whom he had Presbon, Periclymenus, and Eteoclymenus. He was father of Orchomenos, Diochithondes, and Athamas, by a second marriage with Phanasora, the daughter of Paon. According to Plutarch and Ovid he had three daughters. Vid. Mineides. Paus. 9, c. 36.—Plut. Quæst. Græc. 38.—Ov. Met. 4, v. 1 and 468.

Mithras, a god of Persia, supposed to be the sun, or, according to others, Venus Urania. His worship was introduced at Rome, and the Romans raised him altars, on which was this inscription, Deo Soli Mithræ, or Soli Deo invicto Mithræ. He is generally represented as a young man, whose head is covered with a turban after the manner of the Persians. He supports his knee upon a bull that lies on the ground, and one of whose horns he holds in one hand, while with the other he plunges a dagger into his neck. Stat. Theb. 1, v. 720.—Curt. 4, c. 13.—Claudian. de Laud. Stil. 1.

Mnasilus, a youth who assisted Bacchus to tie the old Silenus, whom they found asleep in a cave. Some imagine that Virgil spoke of Varus under the name of Mnasilus. Virg. Ecl. 6, v. 13.

Mnēmŏsўne, a daughter of Cœlus and Terra, mother of the nine Muses, by Jupiter, who assumed the form of a shepherd to gain her company. The word Mnemosyne signifies memory, and therefore the poets have rightly called memory the mother of the Muses, because it is to that mental endowment that mankind are indebted for their progress in science. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 4.—Pindar. Isth. 6.—Hesiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1, c. 1, &c.

Mnēvis, a celebrated bull, sacred to the sun, in the town of Heliopolis. He was worshipped with the same superstitious ceremonies as Apis, and, at his death he received the most magnificent funeral. He was the emblem of Osiris. Diod. 1.—Plut. de Isid.

Mŏlorchus, an old shepherd near Cleonæ, who received Hercules with great hospitality. The hero, to repay the kindness he received, destroyed the Nemæan lion, which laid waste the neighbouring country, and therefore the Nemæan games, instituted on this occasion, are to be understood by the words Lucus Molorchi. There were two festivals instituted in his honour, called Molorchea. Martial. 9, ep. 44, l. 14, ep. 44.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Virg. G. 3, v. 19.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 160.

Molossus. Vid. Part II.

Momus, a god of pleasantry among the ancients, son of Nox, according to Hesiod. He was continually employed in satirising the gods, and whatever they did was freely turned to ridicule. He censured the house which Minerva had made, because the goddess had not made it moveable, by which means a bad neighbourhood might be avoided. Venus herself was exposed to his satire; and when the sneering god had found no fault in the body of the naked goddess, he observed, as he retired, that the noise of her feet was too loud, and greatly improper in the goddess of beauty. These reflections upon the gods were the cause that Momus was driven from heaven. He is generally represented raising a mask from his face, and holding a small figure in his hand. Hesiod. in Theog.—Lucian. in Herm.

Monēta, a surname of Juno among the Romans. She received it because she advised them to sacrifice a pregnant sow to Cybele, to avert an earthquake. Cic. de Div. 1, c. 15.—Livy says, (7, cap. 28,) that a temple was vowed to Juno, under this name, by the dictator Furius, when the Romans waged war against the Aurunci, and that the temple was raised to the goddess of the senate, on the spot where the house of Manlius Capitolinus had formerly stood. Suidas, however, says, that Juno was surnamed Moneta, from assuring the Romans, when in the war against Pyrrhus they complained of want of pecuniary resources, that money could never fail to those who cultivated justice.

Monўchus, a powerful giant, who could root up trees, and hurl them like a javelin. He receives his name from his having the feet of a horse, as the word implies. Juv. 1, v. 11.

Mopsus, I. a celebrated prophet, son of Manto and Apollo, during the Trojan war. He was consulted by Amphimachus, king of Colophon, who wished to know what success would attend his arms in a war which he was going to undertake. He predicted the greatest calamities; but Calchas, who had been a soothsayer of the Greeks during the Trojan war, promised the greatest success. Amphimachus followed the opinion of Calchas, but the opinion of Mopsus was fully verified. This had such an effect upon Calchas that he died soon after. His death is attributed by some to another mortification of the same nature. The two soothsayers, jealous of each other's fame, came to a trial of their skill in divination. Calchas first asked his antagonist how many figs a neighbouring tree bore; ten thousand except one, replied Mopsus, and one single vessel can contain them all. The figs were gathered, and his conjectures were true. Mopsus now, to try his adversary, asked him how many young ones a certain pregnant sow would bring forth. Calchas confessed his ignorance, and Mopsus immediately said, that the sow would bring forth on the morrow ten young ones, of which only one should be a male, all black; and that the females should all be known by their white streaks. The morrow proved the veracity of his prediction, and Calchas died by excess of the grief which his defeat produced. Mopsus, after death, was ranked among the gods; and had an oracle at Malia, celebrated for the true and decisive answers which it gave. Strab. 9.—Paus. 7, c. 3.—Ammian. 14, c. 8.—Plut. de orac. defect.——II. A son of Ampyx and Chloris, born at Titaressa in Thessaly. He was the prophet and soothsayer of the Argonauts, and died at his return from Colchis by the bite of a serpent in Libya. Jason erected him a monument on the seashore, where afterwards the Africans built him a temple where he gave oracles. He has often been confounded with the son of Manto, as their professions and their names were alike. Hygin. fab. 14, 128, 173.—Strab. 9.

Morpheus, the son and minister of the god Somnus, who naturally imitated the grimaces, gestures, words, and manners, of mankind. He is sometimes called the god of sleep. He is generally represented as a sleeping child, of great corpulence, and with wings. He holds a vase in one hand, and in the other are some poppies.

Mors, one of the infernal deities, born of Night, without a father. She was worshipped by the ancients, particularly by the Lacedæmonians, with great solemnity, and represented not as an actually existing power, but as an imaginary being. Euripides introduces her in one of his tragedies on the stage. The moderns represent her as a skeleton armed with a scythe and a cimeter.

Mulciber, a surname of Vulcan, (a mulcendo ferrum,) from his occupation. Ovid Met. 2, v. 5. Vid. Vulcanus.

Murtia, or Myrtia, (a μυρτος,) a supposed surname of Venus, because she presided over the myrtle. This goddess was the patron of idleness and cowardice. Varro de L. L. 4, c. 32.

Muse, certain goddesses, who presided over poetry, music, dancing, and all the liberal arts. They were daughters of Jupiter and Mnemosyne, and were nine in number; Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, Terpsichore, Erato, Polymnia, Calliope, and Urania. Some suppose that there were in ancient times only three Muses, Melete, Mneme, and Acœde; others four, Pelxiope, Acœde, Arche, Melete. They were, according to others, daughters of Pierus and Antiope; from which circumstance they are all called Pierides. The name of Pierides might probably be derived from mount Pierus where they were born. They have been called Castalides, Aganippides, Lebethrides, Anoides, Heliconiades, &c., from the places where they were worshipped, or over which they presided. Apollo, who was the patron and the conductor of the Muses, has received the name of Musagetes, or leader of the Muses. The same surname was also given to Hercules. The palm-tree, the laurel, and all the fountains of Pindus, Helicon, Parnassus, &c., were sacred to the muses. They were generally represented as young, beautiful, and modest virgins. They were fond of solitude, and commonly appeared in different attire, according to the arts and sciences over which they presided. Sometimes, they were represented as dancing in a chorus, to intimate the near and indissoluble connexion which exists between the liberal arts and sciences. The Muses sometimes appear with wings, because by the assistance of wings they freed themselves from the violence of Pyrenæus. The worship of the Muses was universally established, particularly in the enlightened parts of Greece, Thessaly, and Italy. No sacrifices were ever offered to them, though no poet ever began a poem without a solemn invocation to the goddesses who presided over verse. There were festivals instituted in their honour in several parts of Greece, especially among the Thespians, every fifth year. The Macedonians observed also a festival in honour of Jupiter and the Muses. It had been instituted by King Archelaus, and it was celebrated with stage plays, games, and different exhibitions, which continued nine days, according to the number of the Muses. Plut. Erot.—Pollux. Æschin. in Tim.—Paus. 9, c. 29.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 21.—Hesiod. Theog.—Virg. Æn.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 310.—Homer. Hymn. Mus.—Juv. 7.—Diod. 1.—Martial. 4, ep. 14.

Muta, a goddess who presided over silence among the Romans. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 580.

Mutūnus, or Mutīnus, a deity among the Romans, much the same as the Priapus of the Greeks. The Roman matrons, and particularly new married women, disgraced themselves by the ceremonies which custom obliged them to observe before the statue of this impure deity. August. de Civ. D. 4, c. 9, l. 6, c. 9.—Lactant. 1, c. 20.

Myagrus, or Myodes, a divinity among the Egyptians, called also Achor. He was entreated by the inhabitants to protect them from flies and serpents. His worship passed into Greece and Italy. Plin. 10, c. 28.—Paus. 8, c. 26.

Myrrha, a daughter of Cinyras, king of Cyprus. She became enamoured of her father, and had a son by him, called Adonis. When Cinyras was apprized of the incest he had committed, he attempted to stab his daughter, and Myrrha fled into Arabia, where she was changed into a tree called myrrh. Hygin. fab. 58 and 275.—Ovid Met. 10, v. 298.—Plut. in Par.—Apollod. 3.

Myrtilus, a son of Mercury and Phaetusa, or Cleobule, or Clymene, was arm-bearer to Œnomaus, king of Pisa. He was so experienced in riding, and in the management of horses, that he rendered those of Œnomaus the swiftest in all Greece. His infidelity proved at last fatal to him. Vid. Œnomaus. The body of Myrtilus, according to some, was carried by the waves to the seashore, where he received an honourable burial, and as he was the son of Mercury, he was made a constellation. Diod 4.—Hygin. fab. 84 and 224.—Paus. 8, c. 14.—Apollon. 1.

Myscellus. Vid. Part II.

N.

NÆNIA, the goddess of funerals at Rome, whose temple was without the gates of the city. The songs which were sung at funerals were also called nænia. They were generally filled with the praises of the deceased, but sometimes they were so unmeaning and improper, that the word became proverbial to signify nonsense. Varro de Vitâ P. R.—Plaut.—Asin. 41, c. 1, v. 63.

NAIÂDES, or NAIDES, certain inferior deities, who presided over rivers, springs, wells, and fountains. The Naiades generally inhabited the country, and resorted to the woods or meadows near the stream over which they presided, whence the name (ναειν, to flow.) They are represented as young and beautiful virgins, often leaning upon an urn, from which flows a stream of water. Ægle was the fairest of the Naiades, according to Virgil. They were held in great veneration among the ancients, and often sacrifices of goats and lambs were offered to them with libations of wine, honey, and oil. Sometimes they received only offerings of milk, fruit, and flowers. Vid. Nymphæ. Virg. Ecl. 6.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 328.—Homer. Od. 13.

NAIS, I. one of the Oceanides, mother of Chiron or Glaucus, by Magnes. Apollod. 1, c. 9.——II. A nymph, mother by Bucolion of Ægesus and Pedasus. Homer. Il. 6.——III. A nymph in an island of the Red Sea, who, by her incantations, turned to fishes all those who approached her residence after she had admitted them to her embraces. She was herself changed into a fish by Apollo. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 49, &c.

NAPÆÆ, certain divinities among the ancients, who presided over the hills and woods of the country. Some suppose that they were tutelary deities of the fountains and the Naiades of the sea. Their name is derived from ναπη, a grove. Virg. G. 4, v. 585.

NARCÆA, a surname of Minerva in Elis, from her temple there erected by Narcæus.

NARCISSUS, a beautiful youth, son of Cephisus and the nymph Liriope, born at Thespis, in Bœotia. He saw his image reflected in a fountain, and became enamoured of it, thinking it to be the nymph of the place. His fruitless attempts to approach this beautiful object so provoked him, that he grew desperate and killed himself. His blood was changed into a flower, which still bears his name. The nymphs raised a funeral pile to burn his body, according to Ovid, but they found nothing but a beautiful flower. Pausanias says that Narcissus had a sister as beautiful as himself, of whom he became deeply enamoured. He often hunted in the woods in her company, but his pleasure was soon interrupted by her death; and still to keep afresh her memory, he frequented the groves, where he had often attended her, or reposed himself on the brim of a fountain, where the sight of his own reflected image still awakened tender sentiments. Paus. 9, c. 21.—Hygin. fab. 271.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 346, &c.—Philostrat. 1.

NASCIO, or NATIO, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the birth of children. She had a temple at Ardea. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 18.

NAUPLIUS, a son of Neptune and Amymone, king of Eubœa. He was father to the celebrated Palamedes, who was so unjustly sacrificed to the artifice and resentment of Ulysses, by the Greeks, during the Trojan war. When the Greeks returned from the Trojan war, Nauplius saw them with pleasure distressed in a storm on the coast of Eubœa; and to make their disaster still more universal, he lighted fires on such places as were surrounded with the most dangerous rocks, that the fleet might be shipwrecked upon the coast. This succeeded, but Nauplius was so disappointed when he saw Ulysses and Diomedes escape from the general calamity, that he threw himself into the sea. According to some mythologists, there were two persons of this name, a native of Argos, who went to Colchis with Jason. He was the son of Neptune and Amymone. The other was king of Eubœa, and lived during the Trojan war. He was, according to some, son of Clytonas, one of the descendants of Nauplius, the Argonaut. The Argonaut was remarkable for his knowledge of sea affairs, and of astronomy. He built the town of Nauplia, and sold Auge, daughter of Aleus, to King Teuthras, to withdraw her from her father's resentment. Orph. Argon.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Apollon. 1, &c.—Flacc. 1 and 5.—Strab. 8.—Paus. 4, c. 35.—Hygin. fab. 116.

NAUSICAA, a daughter of Alcinous, king of the Phæaceans. She met Ulysses shipwrecked on her father's coasts, and it was to her humanity that he owed the kind reception he experienced from the king. She married, according to Aristotle and Dictys, Telemachus, the son of Ulysses, by whom she had a son called Perseptolis or Ptoliporthus. Homer. Od. 6.—Paus. 5, c. 19.—Hygin. fab. 126.

NAUSITHOUS, a king of the Phæaceans, father to Alcinous. He was son of Neptune and Peribœa. Hesiod makes him son of Ulysses and Calypso. Hesiod. Th. 1, c. 16.

NAUTES, a Trojan soothsayer, who comforted Æneas when his fleet had been burnt in Sicily. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 704. He was the progenitor of the Nautii at Rome, a family to whom the palladium of Troy was, in consequence of the service of their ancestors, intrusted. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 794.

NELÆRA, a daughter of Pereus, who married Aleus, by whom she had Cepheus, Lycurgus, and Auge. Apollod. 3, c. 9.—Paus. 8, c. 4.

NECESSITAS, a divinity who presided over the destinies of mankind, and who was regarded as the mother of the Parcæ. Paus. 2, c. 4.

NELEUS, a son of Neptune and Tyro. He was brother to Pelias, with whom he was exposed by his mother. They were preserved and brought to Tyro, who had then married Cretheus, king of Iolchos. After the death of Cretheus, Pelias and Neleus seized the kingdom of Iolchos, which belonged to Æson, the lawful son of Tyro by the deceased monarch. After they had reigned for some time conjointly, Pelias expelled Neleus from Iolchos. Neleus came to Aphareus, king of Messenia, who treated him with kindness, and permitted him to build a city, which he called Pylos. Neleus married Chloris, the daughter of Amphion, by whom he had a daughter and twelve sons, who were all, except Nestor, killed by Hercules, together with their father. Neleus promised his daughter in marriage only to him who brought him the bulls of Iphiclus. Bias was the successful lover. Vid. Melampus. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 418.—Paus. 4, c. 36.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 2, c. 6.

Nĕmĕsis, one of the infernal deities, daughter of Nox. She was the goddess of vengeance, always prepared to punish impiety, and at the same time liberally to reward the good and virtuous. She is made one of the Parcæ by some mythologists, and is represented with a helm and a wheel. The people of Smyrna were the first who made her statues with wings, to show with what celerity she is prepared to punish the crimes of the wicked both by sea and land, as the helm and the wheel in her hands intimate. Her power did not only exist in this life, but she was also employed after death to find out the most effectual and rigorous means of correction. Nemesis was particularly worshipped at Rhamnus, in Attica, where she had a celebrated statue, 10 cubits long, made of Parian marble by Phidias, or, according to others, by one of his pupils. The Romans were also particularly attentive to the adoration of a deity whom they solemnly invoked, and to whom they offered sacrifices before they declared war against their enemies, to show the world that their wars were undertaken upon the most just grounds. Her statue at Rome was in the capitol. Some suppose that Nemesis was the person whom Jupiter deceived, and that Leda was intrusted with the care of the children which sprang from the two eggs. Others observe that Leda obtained the name of Nemesis after death. According to Pausanias, there were more than one Nemesis. The goddess Nemesis was surnamed Rhamnusia, because worshipped at Rhamnus, and Adrastia from the temple which Adrastus, king of Argos, erected to her when he went against Thebes to avenge the indignities which his son-in-law Polynices had suffered in being unjustly driven from his kingdom by Eteocles. The Greeks celebrated a festival, called Nemesia, in memory of deceased persons, as the goddess Nemesis was supposed to defend the relics and the memory of the dead from all insult. *Hygin. P. Nĕoptŏlĕmus. Vid. Part II.

Nĕphĕlē, the first wife of Athamas, king of Thebes, and mother of Phryxus and Helle. Vid. Athamas & Argonauta. She was changed into a cloud, whence her name is given by the Greeks to the clouds. Some call her Nebula, which word is the Latin translation of Nephele. The fleece of the ram which saved the life of Nephele's children, is often called the Nephelian fleece. Apollod. 1. c. 9.—Hygin. 2, &c.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 195.—Flacc. 11, v. 56.

Nepia, a daughter of Jasus, who married Olympus, king of Mysia, whence the plains of Mysia are sometimes called Nepiæ campi.

Neptūnus, a god, son of Saturn and Ops, and brother to Jupiter, Pluto, and Juno. Neptune shared with his brothers the empire of Saturn, and received as his portion the kingdom of the sea. This, however, did not seem equivalent to the empire of heaven and earth, which Jupiter had claimed, therefore he conspired to dethrone him with the rest of the gods. The conspiracy was discovered, and Jupiter condemned Neptune to build the walls of Troy. Vid. Laomedon. A reconciliation was soon after made, and Neptune was reinstated in all his rights and privileges. Neptune disputed with Minerva the right of giving a name to the capital of Cecropia, but he was defeated. This did not please Neptune; he renewed, therefore, the combat by disputing for Trœzene, but Jupiter settled their disputes by permitting them to be conjointly worshipped there, and by giving the name of Polias, or the protectress of the city, to Minerva, and that of king of Trœzene to the god of the sea. He also disputed his right for the isthmus of Corinth with Apollo; and Briareus, the Cyclops, who was mutually chosen umpire, gave the isthmus to Neptune and the promontory to Apollo. Neptune, as being god of the sea, was entitled to more power than any of the other gods, except Jupiter. Not only the ocean, rivers, and fountains, were subject to him, but he also could cause earthquakes at his pleasure, and raise islands from the bottom of the sea with a blow of his trident. The worship of Neptune was established in almost every part of the earth, and the Libyans in particular venerated him above all other nations, and looked upon him as the first and greatest of the gods. The Greeks and the Romans were also attached to his worship, and they celebrated their Isthmian games and Consualia with the greatest solemnity. He was generally represented sitting in a chariot made of a shell, and drawn by sea-horses or dolphins. Sometimes he is drawn by winged horses, and holds his trident in his hand, and stands up as his chariot flies over the surface of the sea. Homer represents him as issuing from the sea, and in three steps crossing the whole horizon. In the Consualia of the Romans, horses were led through the streets finely equipped and crowned with garlands, as the god, in whose honour the festivals were instituted, had produced the horse, an animal so beneficial for the use of mankind. Paus. 1, 2, &c.—*Homer. Nereides, nymphs of the sea, daughters of Nereus and Doris. They were fifty according to the greater number of the mythologists, some of whose names are as follows: Amphitrite, Eudora, Galena, Glauce, Thetis, Cymothoe, Melita, Agave, Doris, &c. The Nereides were implored as the rest of the deities; they had altars, chiefly on the coast of the sea, where the piety of mankind made offerings of milk, oil, and honey, and often of the flesh of goats. When they were on the seashore they generally resided in grottos and caves, which were adorned with shells and shaded by the branches of vines. Their duty was to attend upon the more powerful deities of the sea, and to be subservient to the will of Neptune. They are represented as young and handsome virgins, sitting on dolphins, and holding Neptune's trident in their hand, or sometimes garlands of flowers. Orpheus Hymn. 23.—Catul. de Rapt.—Pel.—*Ovid. Nēreus, a deity of the sea, son of Oceanus and Terra. He married Doris, by whom he had 50 daughters, called the Nereides. Vid. Nereides. Nereus was generally represented as an old man, with a long flowing beard, and hair of an azure colour. The chief place of his residence was in the Ægean Sea, where he was surrounded by his daughters, who often danced in choruses round him. He had the gift of prophecy, and informed those that consulted him of the different fates that attended them. He acquainted Paris with the consequences of his elopement with Helen; and it was by his directions that Hercules obtained the golden apples of the Hesperides; but the sea-god often evaded the importunities of inquirers by assuming different shapes, and totally escaping from their grasp. The word Nereus is often taken for the sea itself. Nereus is sometimes called the most ancient of all the gods. Hesiod. Theog.—Hygin.—*Homer. Nēsimăchus, the father of Hippomedon, a native of Argos, who was one of the seven chiefs who made war against Thebes. Hygin. 70.—Schol. Stat. Th. 1, v. 44.

Nessus, a celebrated centaur, son of Ixion and the Cloud. He offered violence to Dejanira, whom Hercules had intrusted to his care with orders to carry her across the river Evenus. Vid. Dejanira. Hercules saw the distress of his wife from the opposite shore of the river, and immediately he let fly one of his poisoned arrows, which struck the centaur to the heart. Nessus, as he expired, gave the tunic he then wore to Dejanira, assuring her that, from the poisoned blood which had flowed from his wounds, it had received the power of calling a husband away from unlawful loves. Dejanira received it with pleasure, and this mournful present caused the death of Hercules. Vid. Hercules. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. ep. 9.—Senec. in Herc. fur.—Paus. 3, c. 28.—Diod. 4.

Nisus. Vid. Part II.

Niŏbe, I. a daughter of Tantalus, king of Lydia, by Euryanassa or Dione. She married Amphion, the son of Jasus, by whom she had ten sons and ten daughters according to Hesiod, or two sons and three daughters according to Herodotus. Homer and Propertius say that she had six daughters and as many sons; and Ovid, Apollodorus, &c., according to the more received opinion, support that she had seven sons and seven daughters. The sons were Sipylus, Minytus, Tantalus, Agenor, Phædimus, Damasichthon, and Ismenus; and those of the daughters, Cleodoxa, Ethodæ or Thera, Astyoche, Phthia, Pelopia or Chloris, Asticratea, and Ogygia. The number of her children increased her pride, and she had the imprudence to prefer herself to Latona, who entreated her children to punish the arrogant Niobe. Her prayers were heard, and immediately all the sons of Niobe expired by the darts of Apollo, and all the daughters, except Chloris, who had married Neleus, king of Pylos, were equally destroyed by Diana; and Niobe, struck at the suddenness of her misfortunes, was changed into a stone. The carcasses of Niobe's children according to Homer, were left unburied in the plains for nine successive days, because Jupiter changed into stones all such as attempted to inter them. On the tenth day they were honoured with a funeral by the gods. Homer. Il. 24.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 36.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. fab. 5.—Hygin. fab. 9.—Horat. 4, od. 6.—Propert. 2, el. 6.——II. A daughter of Phoroneus, king of Peloponnesus, by Laodice. She was beloved by Jupiter, by whom she had a son called Argus, who gave his name to Argia or Argolis, a country of Peloponnesus. Paus. 2, c. 22.—Apollod. 2, c. 1, l. 3, c. 8.

Nisus, a king of Megara, son of Mars, or more probably of Pandion. He inherited his father's kingdom with his brothers, and received as his portion the country of Megaris. The peace of the brothers was interrupted by the hostilities of Minos, who wished to avenge the death of his son Androgeus, who had been murdered by the Athenians. Megara was besieged and Attica laid waste. The fate of Nisus depended totally upon a yellow lock, which, as long as it continued upon his head, according to the words of an oracle, promised him life and success in his affairs. His daughter Scylla (often called Nisia Virgo) saw from the walls of Megara the royal besieger, and she became desperately enamoured of him. To obtain a more immediate interview with this object of her passion, she stole away the fatal hair from her father's head as he was asleep; the town was immediately taken, but Minos disregarded the services of Scylla, and she threw herself into the sea. The gods changed her into a lark, and Nisus assumed the nature of the hawk at the very moment that he gave himself death, not to fall into the enemy's hands. These two birds have continually been at variance with each other; and Scylla, by her apprehensions at the sight of her father, seems to suffer the punishment which her perfidy deserved. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 19.—Strab. 9.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 6, &c.—Virg. G. 1, v. 404, &c. Vid. Part II.

Noctilūca, a surname of Diana. She had a temple at Rome, on mount Palatine, where torches were generally lighted in the night. Varro de L. L. 4.—Horat. 4, od. 6, v. 38.

Nomius, a surname given to Apollo, because he fed (νεμω pasco) the flocks of King Admetus in Thessaly. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.

Nortia, a name given to the goddess of Fortune among the Etrurians. Liv. 7, c. 3.

Nox, one of the most ancient deities among the heathens, daughter of Chaos. From her union with her brother Erebus, she gave birth to the Day and the Light. She was also the mother of the Parcæ, Hesperides, Dreams, of Discord, Death, Momus, Fraud, &c. She is called by some of the poets the mother of all things, of gods as well as of men, and therefore she was worshipped with great solemnity by the ancients. She had a famous statue in Diana's temple at Ephesus. It was usual to offer her a black sheep, as she was the mother of the Furies. The cock was also offered to her, as that bird proclaims the approach of day during the darkness of the night. She is represented as mounted on a chariot, and covered with a veil bespangled with stars. The constellations generally went before her as her constant messengers. Sometimes she is seen holding two children under her arms, one of which is black, representing death, or rather night, and the other white, representing sleep or day. Some of the moderns have described her as a woman veiled in mourning, and crowned with poppies, and carried on a chariot drawn by owls and bats. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 950.—Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 455.—Paus. 10, c. 38.—Hesiod. Theog. 125 and 212.

NUMERIA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over numbers. Aug. de Civ. D. 4, c. 11.

NUNDINA, a goddess whom the Romans invoked when they named their children. This happened the ninth day after their birth, whence the name of the goddess, Nona dies. Macrob. Sat. 1, c. 16.

NURSIA, a goddess who patronised the Etrurians. Juv. 10, v. 74.

NYCTELIUS, a surname of Bacchus, because his orgies were celebrated in the night, (νυξ nox, τελεω perficio.) The words later Nyctelius thence signify wine. Seneca in Œdip.—Paus. 1, c. 40.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 15.

NYCTEUS, I. a son of Hyrieus and Clonia. ——II. A son of Chthonius.——III. A son of Neptune by Celene, daughter of Atlas, king of Lesbos, or of Thebes according to the more received opinion. He married a nymph of Crete called Polyxo or Almathea, by whom he had two daughters, Nyctimene and Antiope. The first of these disgraced herself by her criminal amours, and was changed by Minerva into an owl. Nycteus made war against Epopeus, who had carried away Antiope, and died of a wound which he had received in an engagement, leaving his kingdom to his brother Lycus, whom he entreated to continue the war and punish Antiope for her immodest conduct. Vid. Antiope. Paus. 2, c. 6.—Hygin. fab. 157 and 204.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 590, &c. l. 6, v. 110, &c.

NYMPHS, certain female deities among the ancients. They were generally divided into two classes, nymphs of the land and nymphs of the sea. Of the nymphs of the earth, some presided over woods, and were called Dryades and Hamadryades; others presided over mountains, and were called Oreades; some presided over hills and dales, and were called Napææ, &c. The sea-nymphs were called Oceanides, Nereides, Naiades, Potamides, Limnades, &c. These presided over the sea, over rivers, fountains, streams, and lakes. They fixed their residence not only in the sea, but also on mountains, rocks, in woods or caverns; and their grottoes were beautified by evergreens and delightful and romantic scenes. The nymphs were immortal, according to the opinion of some mythologists; others supposed that, like men, they were subject to mortality, though their life was of long duration. They lived for several thousand years, according to Hesiod, or, as Plutarch seems obscurely to intimate, they lived about 9720 years. The number of the nymphs is not precisely known. There were above 3000, according to Hesiod, whose power was extended over the different places of the earth, and the various functions and occupations of mankind. They were worshipped by the ancients, though not with so much solemnity as the superior deities. They had no temples raised to their honour, and the only offerings they received were milk, honey, oil, and sometimes the sacrifice of a goat. They were generally represented as young and beautiful virgins, veiled up to the middle; and sometimes they held a vase, from which they seemed to pour water. Sometimes they had grass, leaves, and shells instead of vases. It was deemed unfortunate to see them naked, and such sight was generally attended by a delirium, to which Propertius seems to allude in this verse, wherein he speaks of the innocence and simplicity of the primitive ages of the world:—

Nec fuerat nudas pœna videre Deas.

The nymphs were generally distinguished by an epithet which denoted the place of their residence; thus the nymphs of Sicily were called Sicelides; those of Corycus, Corycides, &c. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 320, l. 5, v. 412, l. 9, v. 651, &c. Fast. 3, v. 769.—Paus. 10, c. 3.—Plut. de Orac. def.—Orpheus. Arg.—Hesiod. Theog.—Propert. 3, el. 12.—Homer. Od. 14.

NYSÆUS, a surname of Bacchus, because he was worshipped at Nysa. Propert. 3, el. 17, v. 22.

NYSIADES, a name given to the nymphs of Nysa, to whose care Jupiter intrusted the education of his son Bacchus. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 314, &c.

O.

OCEANIDES, and OCEANITIDES, sea-nymphs, daughters of Oceanus, from whom they received their name, and of the goddess Tethys. Hyginus mentions 16, whose names are almost all different from those of Apollodorus and Hesiod, which difference proceeds from the mutilation of the original text. The Oceanides, as the rest of the inferior deities, were honoured with libations and sacrifices. Prayers were offered to them, and they were entreated to protect sailors from storms and dangerous tempests. The Argonauts, before they proceeded to their expedition, made an offering of flour, honey, and oil, on the seashore, to all the deities of the sea; and sacrificed bulls to them, and entreated their protection. When the sacrifice was made on the seashore, the blood of the victim was received in a vessel, but when it was in open sea, the blood was permitted to run down into the waters. When the sea was calm the sailors generally offered a lamb or a young pig, but if it was agitated by the winds, and rough, a black bull was deemed the most acceptable victim. Homer. Od. 3.—Horat.—Apollod. Arg.—Virg. G. 4, v. 341.—Hesiod. Theog. 349.—Apollod. 1.

OCEANUS, a powerful deity of the sea, son of Cœlus and Terra. He married Tethys, by whom he had the most principal rivers, such as the Alpheus, Peneus, Strymon, &c., with a number of daughters, who are called from him Oceanides. According to Homer, Oceanus was the father of all the gods, and on that account he received frequent visits from the rest of the deities. He is generally represented as an old man, with a long flowing beard, and sitting upon the waves of the sea. He often holds a pike in his hand, while ships under sail appear at a distance, or a sea-monster stands near him. Oceanus presided over every part of the sea, and even the rivers were subjected to his power. The ancients were superstitious in their worship to Oceanus, and revered with great solemnity a deity to whose care they intrusted themselves when going on a voyage. Hesiod. Theog.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 81, &c.—Apollod. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 20.—Homer. Il.

Ocnus, a son of the Tiber and of Manto, who assisted Æneas against Turnus. He built a town which he called Mantua after his mother's name. Some suppose that he is the same as Bianor. Virg. Ecl. 10, v. 198.

Ocypete. Vid. Harpiæ.

Odinus, a celebrated hero of antiquity, who flourished about 70 years before the Christian era, in the northern parts of ancient Germany, or the modern kingdom of Denmark. He was at once a priest, a soldier, a poet, a monarch, and a conqueror. He imposed upon the credulity of his superstitious countrymen, and made them believe that he could raise the dead to life, and that he was acquainted with futurity. When he had extended his power, and increased his fame by conquest and by persuasion, he resolved to die in a different manner from other men. He assembled his friends, and with the sharp point of a lance he made on his body nine different wounds in the form of a circle, and as he expired he declared he was going into Scythia, where he should become one of the immortal gods. He further added, that he would prepare bliss and felicity for such of his countrymen as lived a virtuous life, who fought with intrepidity, and who died like heroes in the field of battle. These injunctions had the desired effect; his countrymen superstitiously believed him, and always recommended themselves to his protection whenever they engaged in a battle, and they entreated him to receive the souls of such as had fallen in war.

Œagrus, or Œager, the father of Orpheus by Calliope. He was king of Thrace, and from him mount Hæmus, and also the Hebrus, one of the rivers of the country, has received the appellation of Œagrius, though Servius, in his commentaries, disputes the explanation of Diodorus, by asserting that the Œagrius is a river of Thrace, whose waters supply the streams of the Hebrus. Ovid. in Ib. 414.—Apollon. 1, arg.—Virg. G. 4, v. 524.—Ital. 5, v. 463.—Diod.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.

Œax. Vid. Part II.

Œbalus, I. a son of Argalus or Cynortas, who was king of Laconia. He married Gorgophone, the daughter of Perseus, by whom he had Hippocoon, Tyndarus, &c. Paus. 3, c. 1.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.——II. A son of Telon and the nymph Sebethis, who reigned in the neighbourhood of Neapolis in Italy. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 734.

Œdipus, a son of Laius, king of Thebes, and Jocasta. As being descended from Venus by his father's side, Œdipus was born to be exposed to all the dangers and the calamities which Juno could inflict upon the posterity of the goddess of beauty. Laius, the father of Œdipus, was informed by the oracle, as soon as he married Jocasta, that he must perish by the hands of his son. The queen became pregnant, and Laius ordered his wife to destroy her child as soon as it came into the world. The mother gave the child as soon as born to one of her domestics, with orders to expose him on the mountains. The servant bored the feet of the child, and suspended him with a twig by the heels to a tree on mount Cithæron, where he was soon found by one of the shepherds of Polybus, king of Corinth. The shepherd carried him home; and Peribœa, the wife of Polybus, who had no children, educated him as her own child, with maternal tenderness. The accomplishments of the infant, who was named Œdipus on account of the swelling of his feet, (οιδεω tumeo, ους pedes,) soon became the admiration of the age. His companions envied his strength and his address: and one of them told him he was an illegitimate child. This raised his doubts; he asked Peribœa, who, out of tenderness, told him that his suspicions were ill founded. Not satisfied with this, he went to consult the oracle of Delphi, and was there told not to return home, for if he did, he must necessarily be the murderer of his father, and the husband of his mother. This answer of the oracle terrified him; he knew no home but the house of Polybus, therefore he resolved not to return to Corinth, where such calamities apparently attended him. He travelled towards Phocis, and in his journey met in a narrow road Laius on a chariot with his arm-bearer. Laius haughtily ordered Œdipus to make way for him. Œdipus refused, and a contest ensued, in which Laius and his arm-bearer were both killed. As Œdipus was ignorant of the quality and of the rank of the men he had just killed, he continued his journey, and was attracted to Thebes by the fame of the Sphynx. This terrible monster, whom Juno had sent to lay waste the country, (Vid. Sphynx,) resorted in the neighbourhood of Thebes, and devoured all those who attempted to explain, without success, the enigmas which he proposed. The calamity was now become an object of public concern; and as the successful explanation of an enigma would end in the death of the sphynx, Creon, who at the death of Laius had ascended the throne of Thebes, promised his crown and Jocasta to him who succeeded in the attempt. The enigma proposed was this: What animal in the morning walks upon four feet, at noon upon two, and in the evening upon three? This was left for Œdipus to explain: he came to the monster and said, that man, in the morning of life walks upon his hands and his feet; when he has attained the years of manhood, he walks upon his two legs; and in the evening, he supports his old age with the assistance of a staff. The monster, mortified at the true explanation, dashed his head against a rock and perished. Œdipus ascended the throne of Thebes, and married Jocasta, by whom he had two sons, Polynices and Eteocles, and two daughters, Ismene and Antigone. Some years after, the Theban territories were visited with a plague; and the oracle declared that it should cease only when the murderer of King Laius was banished from Bœotia. As the death of Laius had never been examined, and the circumstances that attended it never known, this answer of the oracle was of the greatest concern to the Thebans; but Œdipus, the friend of his people, resolved to overcome every difficulty by the most exact inquiries. His researches were successful, and he was soon proved to be the murderer of his father. The melancholy discovery was rendered the more alarming, when Œdipus considered that he had not only murdered his father, but that he had committed incest with his mother. In the excess of his grief he put out his eyes, as unworthy to see the light, and banished himself from Thebes, or, as some say, was banished by his own sons. He retired towards Attica, led by his daughter Antigone, and came near Colonos, where there was a grove sacred to the Furies. He remembered that he was doomed by the oracle to die in such a place, and to become the source of prosperity to the country in which his bones were buried. A messenger upon this was sent to Theseus, king of the country, to inform him of the resolution of Œdipus. When Theseus arrived, Œdipus acquainted him, with a prophetic voice, that the gods had called him to die in the place where he stood; and to show the truth of this, he walked himself, without the assistance of a guide, to the spot where he must expire. Immediately the earth opened, and Œdipus disappeared. Some suppose that Œdipus had no children by Jocasta, and that the mother murdered herself as soon as she knew the incest which had been committed. His tomb was near the Areopagus in the age of Pausanias. Some of the ancient poets represent him in hell, as suffering the punishment which crimes like his seemed to deserve. According to some, the four children which he had were by Euriganea, the daughter of Periphas, whom he married after the death of Jocasta. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Hygin. fab. 66, &c.—Eurip. in Phœniss., &c.—*Sophocl. Œneus, a king of Calydon in Ætolia, son of Parthaon or Portheus, and Euryte. He married Althæa, the daughter of Thestius, by whom he had Clymenus, Meleager, Gorge, and Dejanira. After Althæa's death, he married Peribœa, the daughter of Hipponous, by whom he had Tydeus. In a general sacrifice which Œneus made to all the gods upon reaping the rich produce of his fields, he forgot Diana; and the goddess, to revenge this unpardonable neglect, incited his neighbours to take up arms against him, and besides, she sent a wild boar to lay waste the country of Calydonia. The animal was at last killed by Meleager and the neighbouring princes of Greece, in a celebrated chase known by the name of the chase of the Calydonian boar. Some time after, Meleager died, and Œneus was driven from his kingdom by the sons of his brother. Agrius Diomedes, however, his grandson, soon restored him to his throne; but the continual misfortunes to which he was exposed, rendered him melancholy. He exiled himself from Calydon, and left his crown to his son-in-law Andremon. He died as he was going to Argolis. His body was buried by the care of Diomedes, in a town of Argolis, which from him received the name of Œneæ. It is reported that Œneus received a visit from Bacchus, and that Bacchus permitted that wine of which he was the patron should be called among the Greeks by the name of Œneus, (οινος). Hygin. fab. 129.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.—*Homer. Œnoe, a nymph who married Sicinus the son of Thoas, king of Lemnos. From her the island of Sicinus has been called Œnoe.

Œnomaus, a son of Mars by Sterope, the daughter of Atlas. He was king of Pisa in Elis, and father of Hippodamia by Evarete, daughter of Acrisius, or Eurythoa, the daughter of Danaus. He was informed by the oracle that he should perish by the hands of his son-in-law; therefore, as he could skilfully drive a chariot, he determined to marry his daughter only to him who could outrun him, on condition that all who entered the list should agree to lay down their life if conquered. Many had already perished; when Pelops, son of Tantalus, proposed himself. He previously bribed Myrtilus, the charioteer of Œnomaus, by promising him the enjoyment of the favours of Hippodamia if he proved victorious. Myrtilus gave his master an old chariot, whose axle-tree broke on the course, which was from Pisa to the Corinthian isthmus, and Œnomaus was killed. Pelops married Hippodamia, and became king of Pisa. As he expired, Œnomaus entreated Pelops to revenge the perfidy of Myrtilus, which was executed. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Diod. 4.—Paus. 5, c. 17, l. 6, c. 11, &c.—*Apollon. Œnone, a nymph of mount Ida, daughter of the river Cebrenus in Phrygia. As she had received the gift of prophecy, she foretold to Paris, whom she married before he was discovered to be the son of Priam, that his voyage into Greece would be attended with the most serious consequences, and the total ruin of his country; and that he should have recourse to her medicinal knowledge at the hour of death. All these predictions were fulfilled; and Paris, when he had received the fatal wound, ordered his body to be carried to Œnone, in hopes of being cured by her assistance. He expired as he came into her presence; and Œnone was so struck at the sight of his dead body, that she bathed it with her tears, and stabbed herself to the heart. She was mother of Corythus by Paris, and this son perished by the hand of his father when he attempted, at the instigation of Œnone, to persuade him to withdraw his affection from Helen. Dictys Cret.—*Ovid. de Rem. Œnopion, a son of Ariadne by Theseus, or, according to others, by Bacchus. He married Helice, by whom he had a daughter, called Hero, or Merope, of whom the giant Orion became enamoured. The father, unwilling to give his daughter to such a lover, and afraid of provoking him by an open refusal, evaded his applications, and at last put out his eyes when he was intoxicated. Some suppose that this violence was offered to Orion after he had dishonoured Merope. Œnopion received the island of Chios from Rhadamanthus, who had conquered most of the islands of the Ægean Sea, and his tomb was still seen there in the age of Pausanias. Some suppose, and with more probability, that he reigned not at Chios, but at Ægina, which from him was called Œnopia.

Œonus, a son of Licymnius, killed at Sparta, where he accompanied Hercules; and as the hero had promised Licymnius to bring back his son, he burnt the body, and presented the ashes to the afflicted father. From this circumstance arose a custom of burning the dead among the Greeks, according to the mythologists. Schol. Homer. Il.

Ogmius, a name of Hercules among the Gauls. Lucian. in Herc.

Ogygus, a celebrated monarch, the most ancient of those that reigned in Greece. He was son of Terra, or, as some suppose, of Neptune, and married Thebe the daughter of Jupiter. He reigned in Bœotia, which, from him is sometimes called Ogygia, and his power was also extended over Attica. It is supposed that he was of Egyptian or Phœnician extraction; but his origin, as well as the age in which he lived and the duration of his reign are so obscure and unknown, that the epithet of Ogygian is often applied to every thing of dark antiquity. In the reign of Ogyges there was a deluge, which so inundated the territory of Attica, that they remained waste for near 200 years. This, though it is very uncertain, is supposed to have happened about 1764 years before the Christian era, previous to the deluge of Deucalion. According to some writers, it was owing to the overflowing of one of the rivers of the country. The reign of Ogyges was also marked by an uncommon appearance in the heavens; and, as it is reported, the planet Venus changed her colour, diameter, figure, and her course. *Varro de R. Oicleus, a son of Antiphates and Zeuxippe, who married Hypermnestra, daughter of Thestius, by whom he had Iphianira, Polybœa, and Amphiaraus. He was killed by Laomedon when defending the ships which Hercules had brought to Asia when he made war against Troy. Homer. Od. 15.—Diod. 4.—Apollod. 1, c. 8, l. 3, c. 6.—Paus. 6, c. 17.

Oileus, a king of the Locrians. His father's name was Odoedocus, and his mother's Agrianome. He married Eriope, by whom he had Ajax, called Oileus from his father, to discriminate him from Ajax the son of Telamon. He had also another son, called Medon, by a courtesan called Rhene. Oileus was one of the Argonauts. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 45.—Apollon. 1.—Hygin. fab. 14 and 18.—Homer. Il. 13 and 15.—Apollod. 3. c. 10.

Omphale, a queen of Lydia, daughter of Jardanus. She married Tmolus, who, at his death, left her mistress of his kingdom. Omphale had been informed of the great exploits of Hercules, and wished to see so illustrious a hero. Her wish was soon gratified. After the murder of Eurytus, Hercules fell sick, and was ordered to be sold as a slave, that he might recover his health and the right use of his senses. Mercury was commissioned to sell him, and Omphale bought him and restored him to liberty. The hero became enamoured of his mistress, and the queen favoured his passion, and had a son by him, whom some call Agelaus and others Lamon. From this son were descended Gyges and Crœsus; but this opinion is different from the account which makes these Lydian monarchs spring from Alcæus, a son of Hercules, by Malis, one of the female servants of Omphale. Hercules is represented by the poets as so desperately enamoured of the queen, that he spins by her side among her women, while she covers herself with the lion's skin, and arms herself with the club of the hero, and often strikes him with her sandals for the uncouth manner with which he holds the distaff, &c. *Ovid. Ops, (opis,) the daughter of Cœlus and Terra, the same as the Rhea of the Greeks, who married Saturn, and became mother of Jupiter. She was known among the ancients by the different names of Cybele, Bona Dea, Magna Mater, Thya, Tellus, Proserpina, and even of Juno and Minerva; and the worship which was paid to these apparently several deities, was offered merely to one and the same person, mother of the gods. The word Ops seems to be derived from Opus; because the goddess, who is the same as the earth, gives nothing without labour. Tatius built her a temple at Rome. She was generally represented as a matron, with her right hand opened, as if offering assistance to the helpless, and holding a loaf in her left hand. Her festivals were called Opalia, &c. Varro de L. L. 4.—Dionys. Hal. 2, &c.—Tibull. el. 4, v. 68.—Plin. 19, c. 6.

Orion, a celebrated giant, sprung from Jupiter, Neptune, and Mercury. These three gods, as they travelled over Bœotia, met with great hospitality from Hyrieus, a peasant of the country, who was ignorant of their dignity and character. They were entertained with whatever the cottage afforded; and when Hyrieus had discovered that they were gods, because Neptune told him to fill up Jupiter's cup with wine, after he had served it before the rest, the old man welcomed them by the voluntary sacrifice of an ox. Pleased with his piety, the gods promised to grant him whatever he required; and the old man who had lately lost his wife, to whom he had promised never to marry again, desired them that, as he was childless, they would give him a son without another marriage. The gods consented, and Hyrieus, nine months after, found a beautiful child, whom he called Urion. The name was changed into Orion, by the corruption of one letter, as Ovid says, Perdidit antiquum littera prima sonum. Orion soon rendered himself celebrated, and Diana took him among her attendants, and even became deeply enamoured of him. His gigantic stature, however, displeased Œnopion, king of Chios, whose daughter Hero or Merope he demanded in marriage. The king, not to deny him openly, promised to make him his son-in-law as soon as he delivered his island from wild beasts. This task, which Œnopion deemed impracticable, was soon performed by Orion, who eagerly demanded his reward. Œnopion, on pretence of complying, intoxicated his illustrious guest, and put out his eyes on the seashore, where he had laid himself down to sleep. Orion, finding himself blind when he awoke, was conducted by the sound to a neighbouring forge, where he placed one of the workmen on his back, and, by his directions, went to a place where the rising sun was seen with the greatest advantage. Here he turned his face towards the luminary, and, as it is reported, he immediately received his eyesight, and hastened to punish the perfidious cruelty of Œnopion. It is said that Orion was an excellent workman in iron; and that he fabricated a subterraneous palace for Vulcan. Aurora, whom Venus had inspired with love, carried him away into the island of Delos; but Diana, who was jealous of this, destroyed Orion with her arrows. According to Ovid, Orion died of the bite of a scorpion, which the earth produced, to punish his vanity in boasting that there was not on earth any animal which he could not conquer. Some say that Orion was the son of Neptune and Euryale, and that he had received from his father the privilege and power of walking over the sea without wetting his feet. Others make him son of Terra, like the rest of the giants. He had married a nymph, called Sida, before his connexion with the family of Œnopion. According to Diodorus, Orion was a celebrated hunter, superior to the rest of mankind by his strength and uncommon stature. He built the port of Zancle, and fortified the coast of Sicily against the frequent inundations of the sea, by heaping a mound of earth, called Pelorum, on which he built a temple to the gods of the sea. After death Orion was placed in heaven, where one of the constellations still bears his name. The constellation of Orion, placed near the feet of the bull, was composed of 17 stars, in the form of a man holding a sword, which has given occasion to the poets often to speak of Orion's sword. As the constellation of Orion, which rises about the ninth day of March, and sets about the 21st of June, is generally supposed to be accompanied, at its rising, with great rains and storms, it has acquired the epithet of aquosus, given it by Virgil. Orion was buried in the island of Delos; and the monument which the people of Tanagra in Bœotia showed, as containing the remains of this celebrated hero, was nothing but a cenotaph. The daughters of Orion distinguished themselves as much as their father, and when the oracle declared that Bœotia should not be delivered from a dreadful pestilence before two of Jupiter's children were immolated on the altars, they joyfully accepted the offer, and voluntarily sacrificed themselves for the good of their country. Their names were Menippe and Metioche. They had been carefully educated by Diana, and Venus and Minerva had made them very rich and valuable presents. The deities of hell were struck at the patriotism of the two females, and immediately two stars were seen to arise from the earth, which still smoked with the blood, and they were placed in the heavens in the form of a crown. According to Ovid, their bodies were burned by the Thebans, and from their ashes arose two persons, whom the gods soon after changed into constellations. Diod. 4.—*Homer. Orpheus, a son of Œager, by the muse Calliope. Some suppose him to be the son of Apollo, to render his birth more illustrious. He received a lyre from Apollo, or, according to some, from Mercury, upon which he played with such a masterly hand, that even the most rapid rivers ceased to flow, the savage beasts of the forest forgot their wildness, and the mountains moved to listen to his song. The nymphs were his constant companions, but Eurydice only made a deep impression on the melodious musician, and their nuptials were celebrated. Their happiness, however, was short; Aristæus became enamoured of Eurydice, and as she fled from her pursuer, a serpent, that was lurking in the grass, bit her foot, and she died of the poisoned wound. With his lyre in his hand, Orpheus entered the infernal regions, and gained an easy admission to the palace of Pluto. The king of hell was charmed with the melody of his strains, and according to the beautiful expressions of the poets, the wheel of Ixion stopped, the stone of Sisyphus stood still, Tantalus forgot his perpetual thirst, and even the furies relented. Pluto and Proserpine were moved with his sorrow, and consented to restore him Eurydice, provided he forbore looking behind till he had come to the extremest borders of hell. The conditions were gladly accepted, and Orpheus was already in sight of the upper regions of the air, when he forgot his promises, and turned back to look at his long lost Eurydice. He saw her, but she instantly vanished from his eyes. He attempted to follow her, but he was refused admission; and the only comfort he could find, was to sooth his grief at the sound of his musical instrument, in grottoes or on the mountains. He totally separated himself from the society of mankind; and the Thracian women, whom he had offended by his coldness, attacked him while they celebrated the orgies of Bacchus; and after they had torn his body to pieces they threw his head into the Hebrus, which still articulated the words Eurydice! Eurydice! as it was carried down the stream into the Ægean Sea. Orpheus was one of the Argonauts, of which celebrated expedition he wrote a poetical account. This is doubted by Aristotle, who says, according to Cicero, that there never existed an Orpheus; but that the poems which pass under his name, are the compositions of a Pythagorean philosopher named Cercops. According to some of the moderns, the Argonautica, and the other poems attributed to Orpheus, are the production of the pen of Onomacritus, a poet who lived in the age of Pisistratus, tyrant of Athens. Pausanias, however, and Diodorus Siculus, speak of Orpheus as a great poet and musician, who rendered himself equally celebrated by his knowledge of the art of war, by the extent of his understanding, and by the laws which he enacted. Some maintain that he was killed by a thunderbolt. He was buried at Pieria in Macedonia, according to Apollodorus. The inhabitants of Dion boasted that his tomb was in their city; and the people of mount Libethrus, in Thrace, claimed the same honour, and farther observed, that the nightingales, which built their nests near his tomb, sang with greater melody than all other birds. Orpheus, as some report, after death received divine honours; the muses gave an honourable burial to his remains, and his lyre became one of the constellations in the heavens. The best edition of Orpheus is that of Gesner, 8vo. Lips. 1764. Diod. 1, &c.—Paus. 1, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, &c.—Cic. de Nat. D. 1, c. 38.—Apollon. 1.—*Virg. Orus, or Horus, one of the gods of the Egyptians, son of Osiris and of Isis. He assisted his mother in avenging his father, who had been murdered by Typhon. Orus was skilled in medicine; he was acquainted with futurity, and he made the good and happiness of his subjects the sole object of his government. He was the emblem of the sun among the Egyptians, and he was generally represented as an infant swathed in variegated clothes. In one hand he held a staff, which terminated in the head of a hawk, in the other a whip with three thongs. Herodot. 2.—Plut. de Isid. & Os.—Diod. 1. The name is said to signify king or lord.

Osiris, a great deity of the Egyptians, son of Jupiter and Niobe. All the ancients greatly differ in their opinions concerning this celebrated god, but they all agree that, as king of Egypt, he took particular care to civilize his subjects, to polish their morals, to give them good and salutary laws, and to teach them agriculture. After he had accomplished a reform at home, Osiris resolved to go and spread civilization in the other parts of the earth. He left his kingdom to the care of his wife Isis, and of her faithful minister Hermes or Mercury. The command of his troops at home was left to the trust of Hercules, a warlike officer. In his expedition Osiris was accompanied by his brother Apollo, and by Anubis, Macedo, and Pan. His march was through Æthiopia, where his army was increased by the addition of the Satyrs, a hairy race of monsters, who made dancing and playing on musical instruments their chief study. He afterwards passed through Arabia, and visited the greatest of the kingdoms of Asia and Europe, where he enlightened the minds of men by introducing among them the worship of the gods, and a reverence for the wisdom of a supreme being. At his return home, Osiris found the minds of his subjects roused and agitated. His brother Typhon had raised seditions, and endeavoured to make himself popular. Osiris, whose sentiments were always of the most pacific nature, endeavoured to convince his brother of his ill conduct, but he fell a sacrifice to the attempt. Typhon murdered him in a secret apartment, and cut his body in pieces, which were divided among the associates of his guilt. Typhon, according to Plutarch, shut up his brother in a coffer and threw him into the Nile. The inquiries of Isis discovered the body of her husband on the coast of Phœnicia, where it had been conveyed by the waves; but Typhon stole it as it was carrying to Memphis, and he divided it among his companions, as was before observed. This cruelty incensed Isis; she revenged her husband's death, and with her son Orus she defeated Typhon and the partisans of his conspiracy. She recovered the mangled pieces of her husband's body, one part only excepted, which the murderer had thrown into the sea; and to render him all the honour which his humanity deserved, she made as many statues of wax as there were mangled pieces of his body. Each statue contained a piece of the flesh of the dead monarch; and Isis, after she had summoned in her presence, one by one, the priests of all the different deities in her dominions, gave them each a statue, intimating, that, in doing that, she had preferred them to all the other communities of Egypt; and she bound them by a solemn oath that they would keep secret that mark of her favour, and endeavour to show their sense of it by establishing a form of worship and paying divine honours to their prince. They were further directed to choose whatever animals they pleased to represent the person and the divinity of Osiris, and they were enjoined to pay the greatest reverence to that representative of divinity, and to bury it when dead with the greatest solemnity. To render their establishment more popular, each sacerdotal body had a certain portion of land allotted to them to maintain them, and to defray the expenses which necessarily attended the sacrifices and ceremonial rites. That part of the body of Osiris which had not been recovered, was treated with more particular attention by Isis, and she ordered that it should receive honours more solemn, and at the same time more mysterious, than the other members. Vid. Phallica. As Osiris had particularly instructed his subjects in cultivating the ground, the priests chose the ox to represent him, and paid the most superstitious veneration to that animal.

Vid. Apis. Osiris, according to the opinion of some mythologists, is the same as the sun; and the adoration which is paid by different nations to an Anubis, a Bacchus, a Dionysius, a Jupiter, a Pan, &c., is the same as that which Osiris received in the Egyptian temples. Isis also, after death, received divine honours as well as her husband, and as the ox was the symbol of the sun, or Osiris, so the cow was the emblem of the moon, or of Isis. Nothing can give a clearer idea of the power and greatness of Osiris than this inscription, which has been found on some ancient monuments: Saturn, the youngest of of all the gods, was my father; I am Osiris, who conducted a large and numerous army as far as the deserts of India, and travelled over the greatest part of the world, and visited the streams of the Ister, and the remote shores of the ocean, diffusing benevolence to all the inhabitants of the earth. Osiris was generally represented with a cap on his head like a mitre, with two horns; he held a stick in his hand, and in his right a whip with three thongs. Sometimes he appears with the head of a hawk, as that bird, by its quick and piercing eyes, is a proper emblem of the sun. Plut. in Isid. and Os.—Herodot. 2, c. 144.—Diod. 1.—*Homer. Palici, or Palisci, two deities, sons of Jupiter by Thalia, whom Æschylus calls Ætna, in a tragedy which is now lost, according to the words of Macrobius. The god concealed her in the bowels of the earth, and when the time of her delivery was come, the earth opened, and brought into the world two children, who received the name of Palici, απο του παλιν ιεσθαι, because they came again into the world from the bowels of the earth. These deities were worshipped with great ceremonies by the Sicilians, and near the temple were two small lakes of sulphureous water, which were supposed to have sprung out of the earth at the same time that they were born. Near these pools it was usual to take the most solemn oaths, by those who wished to decide controversies and quarrels. If any of the persons who took the oaths perjured themselves, they were immediately punished in a supernatural manner by the deities of the place, and those whose oath was sincere departed unhurt. The Palici had also an oracle, which was consulted upon great emergencies, and which rendered the truest and most unequivocal answers. In a superstitious age the altars of the Palici were stained with the blood of human sacrifices; but this barbarous custom was soon abolished, and the deities were satisfied with their usual offerings. *Virg. Palinurus. Vid. Part II.

Palladium, a celebrated statue of Pallas. It was about three cubits high, and represented the goddess as sitting and holding a pike in her right hand, and in her left, a distaff and a spindle. It fell down from heaven near the tent of Ilus, as that prince was building the citadel of Ilium. Some nevertheless suppose that it fell at Pessinus in Phrygia, or, according to others, Dardanus received it as a present from his mother Electra. There are some authors who maintain that the Palladium was made with the bones of Pelops by Abaris; but Apollodorus seems to say, that it was no more than a piece of clock-work, which moved of itself. On its preservation depended the safety of Troy, and therefore Ulysses and Diomedes were commissioned to steal it away. They effected their purpose; and if we rely upon the authority of some authors, they were directed how to carry it away by Helenus, the son of Priam, who proved, in this, unfaithful to his country, because his brother Deiphobus, at the death of Paris, had married Helen, of whom he was enamoured. Minerva was displeased with the violence which was offered to her statue, and, according to Virgil, the Palladium itself appeared to have received life and motion, and by the flashes which started from its eyes, and its sudden springs from the earth, it seemed to show the resentment of the goddess. The true Palladium, as some authors observe, was not carried away from Troy by the Greeks, but only one of the statues of similar size and shape, which were placed near it to deceive whatever sacrilegious persons attempted to steal it. The Palladium, therefore, as they say, was conveyed safe from Troy to Italy by Æneas, and it was afterwards preserved by the Romans with the greatest secrecy and veneration, in the temple of Vesta; a circumstance which none but the vestal virgins knew. Herodian. 1, c. 14, &c.—*Ovid. PALLANTIAS, a patronymic of Aurora, as being related to the giant Pallas. Ovid. Met. 9, fab. 12.

PALLANTIDES, the 50 sons of Pallas, the son of Pandion and the brother of Ægeus. They were all killed by Theseus, the son of Ægeus whom they opposed when he came to take possession of his father's kingdom.

PALLAS, (adis,) a daughter of Jupiter, the same as Minerva. The goddess received this name either because she killed the giant Pallas, or perhaps from the spear which she seems to brandish in her hands (πάλλει) Vid. Minerva.

PALLAS, I. one of the giants, son of Tartarus and Terra. He was killed by Minerva, who covered herself with his skin, whence, as some suppose, she is called Pallas. Apollod. 3, c. 12. ——II. A son of Crius and Eurybia, who married the nymph Styx, by whom he had Victory, Valour, &c. Hesiod. Theog. Vid. Part II.

PAN, was the god of shepherds, of huntsmen, and of all the inhabitants of the country. He was the son of Mercury, by Dryope, according to Homer. Some give him Jupiter and Callisto for parents; others, Jupiter and Ybis, or Oneis. Lucian, Hyginus, &c. support that he was the son of Mercury and Penelope, the daughter of Icarius. Some authors maintain that Penelope became mother of Pan during the absence of Ulysses in the Trojan war, and that he was the offspring of all the suiters that frequented the palace of Penelope, whence he received the name of Pan, which signifies all or every thing. He had two small horns on his head, his complexion was ruddy, his nose flat, and his legs, thighs, tail, and feet, were those of a goat. The education of Pan was intrusted to a nymph of Arcadia, called Sinoe; but the nurse, according to Homer, terrified at the sight of such a monster, fled away and left him. He was wrapped up in the skin of beasts by his father, and carried to heaven, where Jupiter and the gods long entertained themselves with the oddity of his appearance. Bacchus was greatly pleased with him, and gave him the name of Pan. The god of shepherds chiefly resided in Arcadia, where the woods and the most rugged mountains were his habitation. He invented the flute with seven reeds, which he called Syrinx, in honour of a beautiful nymph of the same name who was changed into a reed. The worship of Pan was well established, particularly in Arcadia, where he gave oracles on mount Lycæus. His festivals, called by the Greeks Lycæa, were brought to Italy by Evander, and they were well known at Rome by the name of the Lupercalia. The worship, and the different functions of Pan, are derived from the mythology of the ancient Egyptians. This god was one of the eight great gods of the Egyptians, who ranked before the other 12 gods whom the Romans called Consentes. He was worshipped with the greatest solemnity all over Egypt. His statues represented him as a goat, not because he was really such, but this was done for mysterious reasons. He was the emblem of fecundity, and they looked upon him as the principle of all things. His horns, as some observe, represented the rays of the sun, and the brightness of the heavens was expressed by the vivacity and the ruddiness of his complexion. The star which he wore on his breast was the symbol of the firmament, and his hairy legs and feet denoted the inferior parts of the earth, such as the woods and plants. He appeared as a goat, because, when the gods fled into Egypt in their war against the giants, Pan transformed himself into a goat; an example which was immediately followed by all the deities. Pan, according to some is the same as Faunus, and he is the chief of all the Satyrs. Plutarch mentions that, in the reign of Tiberius, an extraordinary voice was heard near the Echinades in the Ionian Sea, which exclaimed that the great Pan was dead. This was readily believed by the emperor, and the astrologers were consulted, but they were unable to explain the meaning of so supernatural a voice, which probably proceeded from the imposition of one of the courtiers who attempted to terrify Tiberius. In Egypt, in the town of Mendes which word also signifies a goat, there was a sacred goat kept with the most ceremonious sanctity. The death of this animal was always attended with the greatest solemnities; and, like that of another Apis, became the cause of a universal mourning. As Pan usually terrified the inhabitants of the neighbouring country, that kind of fear which often seizes men, and which is only ideal and imaginary, has received from him the name of panic fear. *Ovid. PANACEA, a goddess, daughter of Æsculapius, who presided over health. Lucan. 9, v. 918.—Plin. 35, c. 11, &c.

PANDA, two deities at Rome, who presided one over the openings of roads, and the other over the openings of towns. Varro de P. R. 1.—A. Gell. 13, c. 22.

PANDARUS, I. Vid. Part II.——II. A native of Crete, punished with death for being accessary to the theft of Tantalus. What this theft was is unknown. Some, however, suppose that Tantalus stole the ambrosia and the nectar from the tables of the gods to which he had been admitted, or that he carried away a dog which watched Jupiter's temple in Crete, in which crime Pandarus was concerned, and for which he suffered. Pandarus had two daughters, Camiro and Clytia, who were also deprived of their mother by a sudden death and left without friends or protectors. Venus had compassion upon them, and the goddesses were all equally interested in their welfare. Venus wished still to make their happiness more complete, and prayed Jupiter to grant them kind and tender husbands. But in her absence the Harpies carried away the virgins, and delivered them to the Eumenides to share the punishment which their father suffered. Paus. 10, c. 30—Pindar. Vid. Part II.

Pandărus, or Pandareus, a man who had a daughter called Philomela. Some suppose him to be the same as Pandion, king of Athens.

Pandemia, a surname of Venus, expressive of her great power over the affections of mankind.

Pandemus, one of the surnames of the god of love among the Egyptians and the Greeks, who distinguished two Cupids, one of whom was the vulgar, called Pandemus, and another of a purer, and more celestial origin. Plut. in Erot.

Pandion, a king of Athens, son of Erichthon and Pasithea, who succeeded his father, B. C. 1437. He became father of Procne and Philomela, Erechtheus, and Butes. During his reign there was such an abundance of corn, wine, oil, that it was publicly reported that Bacchus and Minerva had personally visited Attica. He waged a successful war against Labdacus king of Bœotia, and gave his daughter Procne in marriage to Tereus, king of Thrace, who had assisted him. The treatment which Philomela received from her brother-in-law, Terreus (Vid. Philomela) was the source of infinite grief to Pandion, and he died, through excess of sorrow, after a reign of 40 years. ——There was also another Pandion, son of Cecrops, 2d, by Metiaduca, who succeeded to his father, B. C. 130. He was driven from his paternal dominions, and fled to Pylas, king of Megara, who gave him his daughter Pelia in marriage, and resigned his crown to him. Pandion became father of four children, called from him Pandionidæ, Ægeus, Pallas, Nisus, and Lycus. The eldest of these children recovered his father's kingdom. Some authors have confounded the two Pandions together in such an indiscriminate manner, that they seem to have been only one and the same person. Many believe that Philomela and Procne were the daughters not of Pandion the 1st, but of Pandion the 2d. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 676.— Apollod. 3, c. 15.— Paus. 1, c. 5.— Hygin. fab. 48.

Pandŏra, I. a celebrated woman, the first mortal female that ever lived, according to the opinion of the poet Hesiod. She was made with clay by Vulcan, at the request of Jupiter, who wished to punish the impiety and artifice of Prometheus, by giving him a wife. When this woman of clay had been made by the artist, and received life, all the gods vied in making her presents. Venus gave her beauty and the art of pleasing; the Graces gave her the power of captivating; Apollo taught her how to sing; Mercury instructed her in eloquence; and Minerva gave her the most rich and splendid ornaments. From all these valuable presents, which she had received from the gods, the woman was called Pandora, which intimates that she had received every necessary gift, πᾶν δῶρον. Jupiter, after this, gave her a beautiful box, which she was ordered to present to the man who married her; and by the commission of the god, Mercury conducted her to Prometheus. The artful mortal was sensible of the deceit, and as she had always distrusted Jupiter, as well as the rest of the gods, since he had stolen fire away from the sun to animate his man of clay, he sent away Pandora without suffering himself to be captivated by her charms. His brother Epimetheus was not possessed of the same prudence and sagacity. He married Pandora, and when he opened the box which she presented to him, there issued from it a multitude of evils and distempers which dispersed themselves all over the world, and which, from that fatal moment, have never ceased to afflict the human race. Hope was the only one who remained at the bottom of the box, and it is she alone who has the wonderful power of easing the labours of man, and of rendering his troubles and sorrows less painful in life. Hesiod. Theog. & Dios.—Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Paus. 1, c. 24.—Hygin. 14.——II. A daughter of Erech theus, king of Athens. She was sister to Protogenia, who sacrificed herself for her country at the beginning of the Bœotian war.

Pandrŏsos, a daughter of Cecrops, king of Athens, sister to Aglauros and Herse. She was the only one of the sisters who had not the fatal curiosity to open a basket which Minerva had intrusted to their care, (Vid. Erichthonius,) for which a temple was raised to her near that of Minerva, and a festival instituted to her honour, called Pandrosia. Ovid. Met. 2. v. 738. —Apollod. 3.—Paus. 1, &c.

Pănomphæus, a surname of Jupiter, either because he was worshipped by every nation on earth, or because he heard the prayers and the supplications which were addressed to him, or because the rest of the gods derived from him their knowledge of futurity, (πας omnis, ομφη, vox) Ovid. Met. 11, v. 198.—Homer. Il. 8.

Panŏpe, or Panŏpēa, one of the Nereides, whom sailors general invoked in storms. Her name signifies, giving every assistance, or seeing every thing. Hesiod. Theog. 251.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 825.

Panŏpeus, a son of Phocus and Asterodia, who accompanied Amphitryon when he made war against the Teleboans. He was father to Epeus, who made the celebrated wooden horse at the siege of Troy. Paus. 2, c. 29.—Apollod. 2, c. 4. Vid. Part I.

Pantheus, or Panthus, a Trojan, son of Othryas the priest of Apollo. When his country was burnt by the Greeks, he followed the fortune of Æneas and was killed. Virg. Æn. 2. v. 429.

Paphia, a surname of Venus because the goddess was worshipped at Paphos.

Paphus. Vid Pygmalion.

Parcæ, powerful goddesses, who presided over the birth and the life of mankind. They were three in number, Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos, daughters of Nox and Erebus, according to Hesiod, or of Jupiter and Themis according to the same poet in another poem. Some make them daughters of the sea. Clotho, the youngest of the sisters, presided over the moment in which we are born, and held a distaff in her hand; Lachesis spun out all the events and actions of our life; and Atropos, the eldest of the three, cut the thread of human life with a pair of scissors. The different functions are well expressed in this ancient verse:

Clotho colum retinet, Lachesis net, et Atropos occat.

The name of Parcæ, according to Varro, is derived a partu or parturiendo, because they presided over the birth of men, and by corruption, the word parca is formed from parta or partus, but, according to Servius, they are called so by Antiphrasis, quod nemini parcant. The power of the Parcæ was great and extensive. Some suppose that they were subjected to none of the gods but Jupiter; while others support that even Jupiter himself was obedient to their commands; and, indeed, we see the father of the gods, in Homer's Iliad, unwilling to see Patrocles perish, yet obliged by the superior power of the Fates to abandon him to his destiny. According to the more received opinions, they were the arbiters of the life and death of mankind, and whatever good or evil befalls us in the world immediately proceeds from the Fates or Parcæ. Some make them ministers of the king of hell, and represent them as sitting at the foot of his throne; others represent them as placed on radiant thrones, amidst the celestial spheres, clothed in robes spangled with stars, and wearing crowns on their heads. According to Pausanias, the names of the Parcæ were different from those already mentioned. The most ancient of all, as the geographer observes, was Venus Urania, who presided over the birth of men; the second was Fortune; Ilythia was the third. To these some add a fourth, Proserpina, who often disputes with Atropos the right of cutting the thread of human life. The worship of the Parcæ was well established in some cities of Greece. They received the same worship as the Furies, and their votaries yearly sacrificed to them black sheep, during which solemnity the priests were obliged to wear garlands of flowers. The Parcæ were generally represented as three old women, with chaplets made with wool and interwoven with the flowers of the Narcissus. They were covered with a white robe, and fillet of the same colour, bound with chaplets. One of them held a distaff, another the spindle, and the third was armed with scissors, with which she cut the thread which her sisters had spun. Their dress is differently represented by some authors. Clotho appears in a variegated robe, and on her head is a crown of seven stars. She holds a distaff in her hand reaching from heaven to earth. The robe which Lachesis wore was variegated with a great number of stars, and near her were placed a variety of spindles. Atropos was clothed in black; she held scissors in her hand, with clews of thread of different sizes, according to the length and shortness of the lives whose destinies they seemed to contain. Hyginus attributes to them the inventions of these Greek letters, α, β, η, τ, υ, and others call them the secretaries of heaven, and the keepers of the archives of eternity. The Greeks call the Parcæ by the different names of μοιρα, αισα, κηρ, ειμαρμενη, which are expressive of their power and of their inexorable decrees. *Hesiod. Theog. & scut. Pirus. Vid. Part II.

Parthăon, a son of Agenor and Epicaste, who married Euryte, daughter of Hippodamas, by whom he had many children, among whom were Œneus and Sterope. Parthaon was brother to Demonice, the mother of Evenus by Mars, and also to Molus, Pylus, and Thestius. He is called Portheus by Homer, Il. 14.—Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Hygin. fab. 129 and 239.

Parthĕnŏpæus, a son of Meleager and Atalanta, or, according to some, of Milanion and another Atalanta. He was one of the seven chiefs who accompanied Adrastus the king of Argos in his expedition against Thebes. He was killed by Amphidicus. Apollod. 3, c. 9.—Paus. 3, c. 12, l. 9, c. 19.

Pasiphăe, a daughter of the Sun and of Perseis, who married Minos king of Crete. She disgraced herself by an unnatural passion, which, according to some authors, she was enabled to gratify by means of the artist Dædalus. Minos had four sons by Pasiphæ, Castreus, Deucalion, Glaucus, and Androgeus, and three daughters, Hecate, Ariadne, and Phædra [Vid. Minotaurus.] Plato de Min.—Plut. in Thes.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 24. Hygin. fab. 40.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. Heroid. 4, v. 57 and 165.

Patrŏclus. Vid. Part II.

Patrous, a surname of Jupiter among the Greeks, represented by his statues as having three eyes, which some suppose to signify that he reigned in three different places, in heaven, on earth, and in hell. Paus. 2.

Patulcius, a surname of Janus, which he received a paleo because the doors of his temple were always open in the time of war. Some suppose that he received it because he presided over gates, or because the year began by the celebration of his festivals. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 129.

Paventia, a goddess who presided over terror at Rome, and who was invoked to protect her votaries from its effects. Aug. de civ. 4, c. 11.

Pavor, an emotion of the mind which received divine honours among the Romans, and was considered of a most tremendous power, as the ancients swore by her name in the most solemn manner. Tullus Hostilius, the third king of Rome, was the first who built her temples, and raised altars to her honour, as also to Pallor, the goddess of paleness. Cic. de Nat. D. 8, c. 17.

Pax, an allegorical divinity among the ancients. The Athenians raised her a statue, which represented her as holding Plutus, the god of wealth, in her lap, to intimate that peace gives rise to prosperity and to opulence; and they were the first who erected an altar to her honour after the victories obtained by Timotheus over the Lacedæmonian power, though Plutarch asserts it had been done after the conquests of Cimon over the Persians. She was represented among the Romans with the horn of plenty, and also carrying an olive branch in her hand. The emperor Vespasian built her a celebrated temple at Rome, which was consumed by fire in the reign of Commodus. It was customary for men of learning to assemble in that temple and even to deposite their writings there, as in a place of the greatest security. Therefore, when it was burnt, not only books, but also many valuable things, jewels, and immense treasures, were lost in the general conflagration. C. Nep. in Timoth. 2,—Plut in Cim.—Paus. 9, c. 16.

PEAS, a shepherd, who, according to some, set on fire the pile on which Hercules was burnt. The hero gave him his bow and arrows, Apollod. 2.

PEDÆUS, I. a son of Bucolion, the son of Laomedon. His mother was one of the Naiads, He was killed in the Trojan war by Euryalus. Homer. Il. 6, v. 21.——II. One of the four horses of Achilles. As he was not immortal, like the other three, he was killed by Sarpedon Id. 16. Vid. Part I.

PEGÆIDES, a name given to the Muses from, the horse Pegasus, or from the fountain which Pegasus had raised from the ground by striking it with his foot. Ovid. Her. 15, v. 27.

PĔGÆIS, a name given to Œnone by Ovid, (Her. 5.) because she was daughter of the river πηγη) Cebrenus.

PEGÆSUS, a winged horse, sprung from the blood of Medusa, when Perseus had cut off her head. He received his name from his being born, according to Hesiod, near the sources πηγη) of the ocean. As soon as born he left the earth, and flew up into heaven, or rather, according to Ovid, he fixed his residence on mount Helicon, where, by striking the earth with his foot, he raised a fountain which has been called Hippocrene. He became the favourite of the Muses; and being afterwards aimed by Neptune or Minerva, he was given to Bellerophon to conquer the Chimæra. No sooner was this fiery monster destroyed, than Pegasus threw down his rider, because he was a mortal, or rather, according to the more received opinion, because he attempted to fly to heaven. This act of temerity in Bellerophon was punished by Jupiter, who sent an insect to torment Pegasus, which occasioned the fall of his rider. Pegasus continued his flight up to heaven, and was placed among the constellations by Jupiter. Perseus, according to Ovid, was mounted on the horse Pegasus when he destroyed the sea monster which was going to devour Andromeda. Hesiod. Theog. 282.—Horat. 4. od. 11, v, 20.—Homer. Il. 6, v. 179.—Apollod. 2, c. 3 and 4.—Lycophr. 17.—Paus. 12, c. 3 and 4.—Ovid. Met. v. 785.—Hygin. fab. 57.

PELARGE, a daughter of Potneus, who re-established the worship of Ceres in Bœotia. She received divine honours after death. Paus. 9, 25.

PELASGUS, a son of Terra, or, according to others, of Jupiter and Niobe, who reigned in Argyon, and gave his name to the ancient inhabitants of Peloponnesus.

PĔLĒTHRŌNII, an epithet given to the Lapithæ, because they inhabited the town of Pelethronium, at the foot of mount Pelion in Thessaly; or because one of their number bore the name of Pelethronius. It is to them that mankind are indebted for the invention of the bit with which they tamed their horses with so much dexterity. Virg. G. 3 v. 115.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 452.—Lucan. 6, v. 387.

PELEUS, a king of Thessaly, son of Æacus and Endeis, the daughter of Chiron. He married Thetis, one of the Nereids, and was the only one among mortals who married an immortal. He was accessary to the death of his brother Phocus, and on that account he was obliged to leave his father's dominions. He retired to the court of Eurytus, the son of Actor, who reigned at Phthia, or, according to the less received opinion of Ovid, he fled to Ceyx, king of Trachinia. He was purified of his murder by Eurytus, with the usual ceremonies, and the monarch gave him his daughter Antigone in marriage. Some time after this, Peleus and Eurytus went to the chase of the Calydonian boar, where the father-in-law was accidentally killed by an arrow which his son-in-law had aimed at the beast. This unfortunate event obliged him to banish himself from the court of Phthia, and he retired to Iolchos, where he was purified of the murder of Eurytus, by Acastus the king of the country. His residence at Iolchos was short; Astydamia, the wife of Acastus, became enamoured of him; and when she found him insensible to her passionate declaration, she accused him of attempts upon her virtue. The monarch partially believed the accusations of his wife; but, not to violate the laws of hospitality by putting him instantly to death, he ordered his officers to conduct him to mount Pelion, on pretence of hunting, and there to tie him to a tree, that he might become the prey of the wild beasts of the place. The orders of Acastus were faithfully obeyed; but Jupiter, who knew the innocence of his grandson Peleus, ordered Vulcan to set him at liberty. As soon as he had been delivered from danger, Peleus assembled his friends to punish the ill treatment which he had received from Acastus. He forcibly took Iolchos, drove the king from his possessions, and put to death the wicked Astydamia. After the death of Antigone, Peleus courted Thetis, of whose superior charms Jupiter himself had been enamoured. His pretensions, however, were rejected, and as he was a mortal, the goddess fled from him with the greatest abhorrence. Peleus became more animated from her refusal; he offered a sacrifice to the gods, and Proteus informed him that to obtain Thetis he must surprise her while she was asleep in her grotto near the shores of Thessaly. This advice was immediately followed, and Thetis unable to escape from the grasp of Peleus, at last consented to marry him. Their nuptials were celebrated with the greatest solemnity, and all the gods attended, and made them each the most valuable presents. The goddess of discord was the only one of the deities who was not present. Vid. Discordia. From the marriage of Peleus and Thetis was born Achilles, whose education was early intrusted to the centaur Chiron, and afterwards to Phœnix, the son of Amyntor. Achilles went to the Trojan war at the head of his father's troops, and Peleus gloried in having a son who was superior to all the Greeks in valour and intrepidity. The death of Achilles was the source of grief to Peleus; and Thetis, to comfort her husband, promised him immortality, and ordered him to retire into the grottoes of the island of Leuce, where he would see and converse with the manes of his son. Peleus had a daughter called Polydora, by Antigone. Homer. Il. 9, v. 482.—Eurip. in Androm.—Catul. de Nupt. Pel. & Thet.—Ovid. Heroid. 5. Fast. 2, Met. 11, fab. 7 and 8.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Paus. 2, c. 29.—Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 54.

PELIAS, the twin brother of Neleus, was son of Neptune by Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus. His birth was concealed from the world by his mother, who wished her father to be ignorant of her incontinence. He was exposed in the woods, but his life was preserved by shepherds, and he received the name of Pelias, from a spot of the colour of lead in his face. Some time after this adventure, Tyro married Cretheus, son of Æolus, king of Iolchos, and became mother of three children, of whom Æson was the eldest. Meantime, Pelias visited his mother, and was received in her family, and after the death of Cretheus, he unjustly seized the kingdom, which belonged to the children of Tyro by the deceased monarch. To strengthen himself in his usurpation, Pelias consulted the oracle; and when he was told to beware of one of the descendants of Æolus, who should come to his court with one foot shod and the other bare, he privately removed the son of Æson, after he had publicly declared that he was dead. These precautions proved abortive. Jason, the son of Æson, who had been educated by Chiron, returned to Iolchos when arrived to years of maturity, and boldly demanded the kingdom. Pelias told him that he would voluntarily resign the crown to him if he went to Colchis to avenge the death of Phryxus, the son of Athamas, whom Æetes had cruelly murdered. This was accepted by the young hero, and his intended expedition was made known all over Greece. Vid. Jason. During the absence of Jason, in the Argonautic expedition, Pelias murdered Æson and all his family; but according to the more received opinion of Ovid, Æson was still living when the Argonauts returned, and was restored to the vigour of youth by the magic of Medea. The daughters of Pelias, who had received the patronymic of Peliades, expressed their desire to see their father's infirmities vanish by the same powerful arts. Medea who wished to avenge the injuries which her husband Jason had received from Pelias, raised the desires of the Peliades, by cutting an old ram to pieces, and boiling the flesh in a caldron, and afterwards turning it into a fine young lamb. After they had seen this successful experiment, the Peliades cut their father's body to pieces, after they had drawn all his blood from his veins, on the assurance that Medea would replenish them by her incantations. The limbs were immediately put into a caldron of boiling water; but Medea suffered the flesh to be totally consumed, and refused to give the Peliades the promised assistance, and the bones of Pelias did not even receive a burial. The Peliades were four in number, Alceste, Pisidice, Pelopea, and Hippothoe, to whom Hyginus adds Medusa. Their mother's name was Anaxibia, the daughter of Bias or Philomache, the daughter of Amphion. After this parricide, the Peliades fled to the court of Admetus, where Acastus, the son-in-law of Pelias, pursued them and took their protector prisoner. The Peliades died, and were buried in Arcadia. Hygin. fab. 12, 13 and 14.—Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 3 and 4.—Heroid. 12, v. 129.—Paus. 8, c. 11.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Seneca in Med.—*Apollod. PELOPEA, or PELOPIA. Vid. Part II.

PELOPS, a celebrated prince, son of Tantalus, king of Phrygia. The mother's name was Euryanassa, or, according to others, Euprytone, or Eurystemista, or Dione. He was murdered by his father, who wished to try the divinity of the gods who had visited Phrygia, by placing on their table the limbs of his son. The gods perceived his perfidious cruelty, and they refused to touch the meat, except Ceres, whom the recent loss of her daughter had rendered melancholy and inattentive. She eat one of the shoulders of Pelops, and therefore, when Jupiter had compassion on his fate, and restored him to life, he placed a shoulder of ivory instead of that which Ceres had devoured. This shoulder had an uncommon power, and it could heal, by its very touch, every complaint, and remove every disorder. Some time after, the kingdom of Tantalus was invaded by Tros, king of Troy, on pretence that he had carried away his son Ganymedes. This rape had been committed by Jupiter himself; the war, nevertheless, was carried on, and Tantalus, defeated and ruined, was obliged to fly with his son Pelops, and to seek a shelter in Greece. This tradition is confuted by some, who support that Tantalus did not fly into Greece, as he had been some time before confined by Jupiter in the infernal regions for his impiety, and therefore Pelops was the only one whom the enmity of Tros persecuted. Pelops came to Pisa, where, (Vid. Œnomaus) he married Hippodamia. According to some authors, Pelops had received some winged horses from Neptune, with which he was enabled to outrun Œnomaus. When he had established himself on the throne of Pisa, Hippodamia's possession, he extended his conquest over the neighbouring countries, and from him the peninsula, of which he was one of the monarchs, received the name of Peloponnesus. Pelops, after death received divine honours; and he was as much revered above all the other heroes of Greece, as Jupiter was above the rest of the gods. He had a temple at Olympia, near that of Jupiter, where Hercules consecrated to him a small portion of land, and offered to him a sacrifice. The place where this sacrifice had been offered was religiously observed, and the magistrates of the country yearly, on coming into office, made there an offering of a black ram. During the sacrifice the soothsayer was not allowed, as at other times, to have a share of the victim; and all such as offered victims received a price equivalent to what they gave. The white poplar was generally used in the sacrifices made to Jupiter and to Pelops. The children of Pelops by Hippodamia were Pitheus, Trœzene, Atreus, Thyestes, &c. The time of his death is unknown, though it is universally agreed that he survived for some time Hippodamia. Some suppose that the Palladium of the Trojans was made with the bones of Pelops. His descendants were called Pelopidæ. Pindar says that Neptune took him up to heaven, to become the cupbearer to the gods, from which he was expelled when the impiety of Tantalus wished to make mankind partake of the nectar and the entertainments of the gods. Some suppose that Pelops first instituted the Olympic games in honour of Jupiter, and to commemorate the victory which he had obtained over Œnomaus. Paus. 5. c. 1, &c.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Eurip. in Iphig.—Diod. 3.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 1, c. 18.—Pindar. Od. 1.—Virg. G. 3, v. 7.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 404, &c.—Hygin. fab. 9, 82 and 83.

PĔNĀTES, certain inferior deities among the Romans, who presided over houses and the domestic affairs of families. They were called Penates, because they were generally placed in the innermost and most secret parts of the house, in penitissimâ ædium parte, quod, as Cicero says, penitus insident. The place where they stood was afterwards called Penetralia, and they themselves received the name of Penetrales. It was in the option of every master of a family to choose his Penates, and therefore Jupiter and some of the superior gods are often invoked as patrons of domestic affairs. According to some, the gods Penates were divided into four classes; the first comprehended all the celestial, the second the sea-gods, the third the gods of hell, and the last all such heroes as had received divine honours after death. The Penates were originally the names of the dead, and in the early ages of Rome human sacrifices were offered to them; but Brutus, who expelled the Tarquins, abolished this custom. When offerings were made to them, their statutes were crowned with garlands, poppies, or garlic; and besides the monthly day that was set apart for their worship, their festivals were celebrated during the Saturnalia. *Cic. de Nat. PENTHESĪLĒA, a queen of the Amazons, daughter of Mars, by Otrera, or Orithya. She came to assist Priam in the last year of the Trojan war, and fought against Achilles, by whom she was slain. The hero was so struck with the beauty of Penthesilea, when he stripped her of her arms, that he even shed tears for having too violently sacrificed her to his fury. Thersites laughed at the partiality of the hero, for which ridicule he was instantly killed. The death of Thersites so offended Diomedes, that he dragged the body of Penthesilea out of the camp, and threw it into the Scamander. It is generally supposed that Achilles was enamoured of the Amazon before he fought with her, and that she had by him a son called Cayster. Dictys Cret. 3 and 4.—Paus. 10, c. 31.—*Q. PENTHEUS, son of Echion and Agave, was king of Thebes in Bœotia. His refusal to acknowledge the divinity of Bacchus was attended with the most fatal consequences. He forbade his subjects to pay adoration to his new god; and when the Theban women had gone out of the city to celebrate the orgies of Bacchus, Pentheus, appr ed of the debauchery which attended the solemnity, commanded his soldiers to destroy the whole band of the bacchanals. This, however, was not executed, for Bacchus inspired the monarch with the ardent desire of seeing the celebration of the orgies. Accordingly he hid himself in a wood on mount Cithæron, from whence he could see all the ceremonies unperceived. But here his curiosity soon proved fatal; he was descried by the bacchanals, and they all rushed upon him. His mother was the first who attacked him; her example was instantly followed by her two sisters, Ino and Autonoe, and his body was torn to pieces. Euripides introduces Bacchus among his priestesses, when Pentheus was put to death; but Ovid, who relates the whole in the same manner, differs from the Greek poet only in saying, that not Bacchus himself, but one of his priests was present. The tree on which the bacchanals found Pentheus, was cut down by the Corinthians, by order of the oracle, and with it two statutes of the god of wine were made, and placed in the forum. Hygin. fab. 184.—Theocrit. 26.—*Ovid. PERIBŒA, I. the second wife of Œneus, king of Calydon, was daughter of Hipponous. She became mother of Tideus. Hygin. fab. 69.—II. A daughter of Alcathous, sold by her father on suspicion that she was courted by Telamon, son of Æacus, king of Ægina. She was carried to Cyprus, where Telamon the founder of Salamis married her, and she became mother of Ajax. She also married Theseus, according to some. She is also called Eribœa. Paus. 1, c. 17 and 42.—Hygin. 97.—III. The wife of Polybus, king of Corinth, who educated Œdipus as her own child.

PERICLYMĔNUS, one of the twelve sons of Neleus, brother to Nestor, killed by Hercules. He was one of the Argonauts, and had received from Neptune, his grandfather, the power of changing himself into whatever shape he pleased. Apollod.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 556.

PERIGŎNE, a woman who had a son called Melanippus, by Theseus. She was daughter of Synnis, the famous robber whom Theseus killed. She married Deioneus the son of Eurytus, by consent of Theseus. Plut. in Thes.—Paus. 10, c. 25.

PERIMĒLA, a daughter of Hippodamus, thrown into the sea for receiving the addresses of the Achelous. She was changed into an island in the Ionian Sea, and became one of the Echinades. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 790.

PERO, or PERONE, a daughter of Neleus, king of Pylos, by Chloris. Vid. Melampus. She became mother of Talaus. Homer. Od. 11, v. 284.—Propert. 2, el. 2, v. 17.—Paus. 4, c. 36. Vid. Part II.

PERSĔPHŎNE, called also Proserpine. Vid. Proserpine.

PERSEUS, a son of Jupiter and Danae, the daughter of Acrisius, thrown into the sea with his mother. Vid. Danae. The slender boat which carried Danae and her son was driven by the winds upon the coasts of the island of Seriphos, one of the Cyclades, where they were found by a fisherman called Dictys, and carried to Polydectes, the king of the place. Perseus was intrusted to the care of the priest of Minerva's temple. His rising genius and manly courage, however, soon displeased Polydectes, who invited all his friends to a sumptuous entertainment, at which it was requisite all such as came should present the monarch with a beautiful horse. Perseus was in the number of the invited, and the more particularly so, as Polydectes knew that he could not receive from him the present which he expected from all the rest. Nevertheless Perseus, who wished not to appear inferior to the others in magnificence, told the king, that as he could not give him a horse, he would bring him the head of Medusa, the only one of the Gorgons who was subject to mortality. Vid. Gorgones. Polydectes accepted the offer, and Perseus departed for the country of those formidable monsters. Having cut off the head of Medusa, he continued his journey across the deserts of Liva, but the approach of night obliged him to alight in the territories of Atlas, king of Mauretania. He went to the monarch's palace, where he hoped to find a kind reception by announcing himself as the son of Jupiter; but in this he was disappointed. Atlas recollected that, according to an ancient oracle, his gardens were to be robbed of their fruit by one of the sons of Jupiter, and therefore he not only refused Perseus the hospitality he demanded, but he even offered violence to his person. Perseus, finding himself inferior to his powerful enemy, showed him Medusa's head, and instantly Atlas was changed into a large mountain which bore the same name in the deserts of Africa. On the morrow Perseus continued his flight, and as he passed across the territories of Libya, he discovered, on the coasts of Æthiopia, the naked Andromeda, exposed to a sea-monster. He was struck at the sight, and offered her father Cepheus to deliver her, and obtained her in marriage as a reward of his labours. The universal joy, however, was soon disturbed. Phineus, Andromeda's uncle, entered the palace with a number of armed men, and attempted to carry away the bride, whom he had courted and admired long before the arrival of Perseus. A bloody battle ensued, and Perseus must have fallen a victim to the rage of Phineus, had not he defended himself at last with the same arms which proved fatal to Atlas. He showed the Gorgon's head to his adversaries, and they were instantly turned to stone, each in the posture and attitude in which he then stood. Soon after this memorable adventure Perseus retired to Seriphos, at the very moment that his mother Danae fled to the altar of Minerva to avoid the pursuit of Polydectes, who attempted to offer her violence. Dictys, who had saved her from the sea, and who, as some say, was the brother of Polydectes, defended her against the attempts of her enemies, and therefore Perseus, sensible of his merit and of his humanity, placed him on the throne of Seriphos, after he had with Medusa's head turned into stones the wicked Polydectes and the officers who were the associates of his guilt. He afterwards restored to Mercury the talaria and the wings, to Pluto the helmet, to Vulcan the sword, and to Minerva the shield, which they had lent him to accomplish the death of Medusa; but as he was more particularly indebted to the goddess of wisdom for her assistance and protection, he placed the Gorgon's head on her shield, or rather, according to the more received opinion, on her ægis. After he had finished these celebrated exploits, Perseus expressed a wish to return to his native country, and accordingly he embarked for the Peloponnesus, with his mother and Andromeda. When he reached the Peloponnesian coasts he was informed that Teutamias, king of Larissa, was then celebrating funeral games in honour of his father. This intelligence drew him to Larissa to signalize himself in throwing the quoit, of which, according to some, he was the inventor. But here he was attended by an evil fate, and had the misfortune to kill a man with a quoit which he had thrown in the air. This was no other than his grandfather Acrisius, who, on the first intelligence that his grandson had reached the Peloponnesus, fled from his kingdom of Argos to the court of his friend and ally Teutamias, to prevent the fulfilling of the oracle, which had obliged him to treat his daughter with so much barbarity. Some suppose, with Pausanias, that Acrisius had gone to Larissa to be reconciled to his grandson, whose fame had been spread in every city of Greece; and Ovid maintains that the grandfather was under the strongest obligation to his son-in-law, as through him he had received his kingdom, from which he had been forcibly driven by the sons of his brother Prœtus. This unfortunate murder greatly depressed the spirits of Perseus; by the death of Acrisius he was entitled to the throne of Argos, but he refused to reign there: and to remove himself from a place which reminded him of the parricide he had unfortunately committed, he exchanged his kingdom for that of Tirynthus, and the maritime coast of Argolis, where Megapenthes, the son of Prœtus, then reigned. When he had finally settled in this part of the Peloponnesus, he determined to lay the foundations of a new city, which he made the capital of his dominions, and which he called Mycenæ, because the pommel of his sword, called by the Greeks μύκες, had fallen there. The time of his death is unknown, yet it is universally agreed that he received divine honours like the rest of the ancient heroes. He had statues at Mycenæ and in the island of Seriphos, and the Athenians raised him a temple, in which they consecrated an altar in honour of Dictys, who had treated Danae and her infant son with so much paternal tenderness. The Egyptians also paid particular honour to his memory, and asserted that he often appeared among them wearing shoes two cubits long, which was always interpreted as a sign of fertility. Perseus had by Andromeda, Alceus, Sthenelus, Nestor, Electryon, and Gorgophone; and after death, according to some mythologists, he became a constellation in the heavens. Herodot. 2, c. 91.—Apollod. 2. c. 4, &c.—Paus. 2, c. 16 and 18, l. 3, c. 17, &c.—*Apollon. PERTUNDA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the consummation of marriage. Her statue was generally placed in the bridal chamber. Varro. apud. Aug. Civ. D. 6, c. 9.

PETEUS, a son of Orneus, and grandson of Erechtheus. He reigned in Attica, and became father of Menestheus, who went with the Greeks to the Trojan war. He is represented by some of the ancients as a monster, half a man and half a beast. Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Paus. 10, c. 35.

PHÆA, a celebrated sow which infested the neighbourhood of Cromyon. It was destroyed by Theseus, as he was travelling from Trœzene to Athens to make himself known to his father. Some suppose that the boar of Calydon sprang from this sow. Phæa, according to some authors, was no other than a woman who prostituted herself to strangers, whom she murdered and afterwards plundered. Plut. in Thes.—Strab. 8.

PHÆDRA, a daughter of Minos and Pasiphae, who married Theseus, by whom she became mother of Acamas and Demophoon. Venus inspired Phædra with an unconquerable passion for Hippolytus the son of Theseus, by the amazon Hippolyte; and in the absence of Theseus, she addressed Hippolytus with all the impatience of love. Hippolytus rejected her with horror and disdain; but Phædra, incensed on account of the reception she had met, resolved to punish his coldness and refusal. At the return of Theseus she accused Hippolytus of attempts upon her virtue. The credulous father listened to the accusation, and, without hearing the defence of Hippolytus, he banished him from his kingdom, and implored Neptune, who had promised to grant three of his requests, to punish him in some exemplary manner. As Hippolytus fled from Athens, his horses were suddenly terrified by a huge sea-monster, which Neptune had sent on the shore. He was dragged through precipices and over rocks, and was trampled under the feet of his horses, and crushed under the wheels of his chariot. When the tragical end of Hippolytus was known at Athens, Phædra confessed her crime, and hung herself in despair, unable to survive one whose death her guilt had occasioned. The death of Hippolytus, and the infamous passion of Phædra, are the subject of one of the tragedies of Euripides and of Seneca. Phædra was buried at Trœzene, where her tomb was still seen in the age of the geographer Pausanias, near the temple of Venus, which she had built to render the goddess favourable to her passion. There was near her tomb a myrtle, whose leaves were all full of small holes, and it was reported, that Phædra had done this with a hair pin, when the vehemence of her passion had rendered her melancholy and almost desperate. She was represented in a painting in Apollo's temple at Delphi as suspended by a cord, and balancing herself in the air, while her sister Ariadne stood near to her and fixed her eyes upon her; a delicate idea, by which the genius of the artist intimated her melancholy end. Plut. in Thes.—Paus. 1, c. 22, l. 2, c. 32.—Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 47 and 243.—Eurip. in Senec. & in Hippol.—*Virg. PHÆNNA, one of the two Graces worshipped at Sparta, together with her sister Clita. Lacedæmon first paid them particular honours. Paus. 9, c. 35.

PHAËTON, a son of the sun, or Phœbus, and Clymene, one of the Oceanides. He was son of Cephalus and Aurora according to Hesiod and Pausanias, or of Tithonus and Aurora according to Apollodorus. He is, however, more generally acknowledged to be the son of Phœbus and Clymene. When Epaphus, the son of Io, told him, to check his pride, that he was not the son of Phœbus, Phaeton resolved to know his true origin, and, at the instigation of his mother, he visited the palace of the sun. He begged Phœbus, that if he really were his father, he would give him incontestable proofs of his paternal tenderness and convince the world of his legitimacy. Phœbus swore by the Styx that he would grant him whatever he required, and no sooner was the oath uttered than Phaeton demanded of him to drive his chariot for one day. Phœbus represented the dangers to which it would expose him, but in vain; and, as the oath was inviolable and Phaeton unmoved, the father instructed his son how he was to proceed in his way through the regions of the air. His explicit directions were forgotten, or little attended to; and no sooner had Phaeton received the reins from his father, than he betrayed his ignorance and incapacity to guide the chariot. The flying horses became sensible of the confusion of their driver, and immediately departed from their usual track. Phaeton repented too late of his rashness, and already heaven and earth were threatened with a universal conflagration, when Jupiter, who had perceived the disorder of the horses of the sun, struck the rider with one of his thunderbolts, and hurled him headlong from heaven into the river Po. His body, consumed with fire, was found by the nymphs of the place, and honoured with a decent burial. His sister mourned his unhappy end, and were changed into poplars by Jupiter. Vid. Phaetontiades. According to the poets, while Phaeton was unskilfully driving the chariot of his father, the blood of the Æthiopians was dried up, and their skin became black, a colour which is still preserved among the greatest part of the inhabitants of the torrid zone. The territories of Libya were also parched up, according to the same tradition, on account of their too great vicinity to the sun; and ever since, Africa, unable to recover her original verdure and fruitfulness, has exhibited a sandy country and uncultivated waste. According to those who explain this poetical fable, Phaeton was a Ligurian prince who studied astronomy, and in whose age the neighbourhood of the Po was visited with uncommon heats. The horses of the sun are called Phaetontis equi, either because they were guided by Phaeton, or from the Greek word (φαθων,) which expresses the splendour and lustre of that luminary. *Virg. PHAËTONTIADES, or PHAËTONTIDES, the sisters of Phaeton.

PHAON, a boatman of Mitylene, in Lesbos. He received a small box of ointment from Venus, who had presented herself to him in the form of an old woman, to be carried over into Asia; and as soon as he had rubbed himself with what the box contained, he became one of the most beautiful men of his age. Many were captivated with the charms of Phaon, and, among others, Sappho, the celebrated poetess. Ælian. V. H. 12.—*Ovid. PHEGEUS, or PHLEGEUS, a priest of Bacchus, the father of Alphesibœa, who purified Alcmæon of his mother's murder, and gave him his daughter in marriage. Vid. Alcmæon. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 412.

PHERÆUS, a surname of Jason, as being a native of Pheræ.

PHEREPHATE, a surname of Proserpine, from the production of corn.

PHERES, I. a son of Cretheus and Tyro, who built Pheræ in Thessaly, where he reigned. He married Clymene, by whom he had Admetus and Lycurgus. Apollod.——II. A son of Medea, stoned to death by the Corinthians on account of the poisonous clothes which he had given to Glauce, Creon's daughter. Paus. 2, c. 3.

PHERETIAS, a patronymic of Admetus, son of Pheres. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 291.

PHILÆUS, I. a son of Ajax by Lyside, the daughter of Coronus, one of the Lapithæ. Miltiades, as some suppose, was descended from him.——II. A son of Augeas, who upbraided his father for not granting what Hercules justly claimed for cleaning his stables. Vid. Augeas. He was placed upon his father's throne by Hercules. Apollod. 2.

PHILOCTÊTES. Vid. Part II.

PHILOLAUS, a son of Minos, by the nymph Paria, from whom the island of Paros received its name. Hercules put him to death because he had killed two of his companions. Apollod. 3, c. 1.

PHILOMÀCHE, the wife of Pelias, king of Iolchos. According to some writers she was daughter to Amphion, king of Thebes, though she is more generally called Anaxibia, daughter of Bias. Apollod. 1.

PHILOMÈLA, a daughter of Pandion, king of Athens and sister to Procne, who had married Tereus king of Thrace. Procne prevailed upon her husband to go to Athens, and bring her sister to Thrace. Tereus obeyed his wife's injunctions, but he had no sooner obtained Pandion's permission to conduct Philomela to Thrace, than he became enamoured of her. He dismissed the guards, whom the suspicions of Pandion had appointed to watch his conduct, and he offered violence to Philomela, and afterwards cut off her tongue that she might not be able to discover his barbarity and the indignities which she had suffered. He confined her also in a lonely castle; and after he had taken every precaution to prevent a discovery, he returned to Thrace, and told Procne that Philomela had died by the way. Procne, at this sad intelligence, put on mourning for the loss of Philomela; but a year had scarcely elapsed before she was secretly informed that her sister was not dead. Philomela, during her captivity, described on a piece of tapestry her misfortunes and the brutality of Tereus, and privately conveyed it to Procne. She was then going to celebrate the orgies of Bacchus when she received it; she disguised her resentment, and as during the festivals of the god of wine, she was permitted to rove about the country, she hastened to deliver her sister Philomela from her confinement, and concerted with her on the best measures of punishing the cruelty of Tereus. She murdered her son Itys, who was in the sixth year of his age, and served him up as food before her husband during the festival. Tereus, in the midst of his repast, called for Itys, but Procne immediately informed him that he was then feasting on his flesh, and that instant Philomela, by throwing on the table the head of Itys, convinced the monarch of the cruelty of the scene. He drew his sword to punish Procne and Philomela, but as he was going to stab them to the heart, he was changed into a hoopoe, Philomela into a nightingale, Procne, into a swallow, and Itys into a pheasant. This tragical scene happened at Daulis in Phocis; but Pausanias and Strabo, who mentioned the whole of the story, are silent about the transformation; and the former observes that Tereus, after this bloody repast, fled to Megara, where he destroyed himself. The inhabitants of the place raised a monument to his memory, where they offered yearly sacrifices, and placed small pebbles instead of barley. It was on this monument that the birds called hoopoes were first seen; hence the fable of his metamorphosis. Procne and Philomela died through excess of grief and melancholy; and as the nightingale and swallow's voice is peculiarly plaintive and mournful, the poets have embellished the fable, by supposing that the two unfortunate sisters were changed into birds. Apollod. 3, c. 14.—Paus. 1, c. 42, l. 10, c. 4.—Hygin. fab. 45.—Strab. 9.—*Ovid. PHILONOE, a daughter of Iobates, king of Lycia, who married Bellerophon. Apollod. 2.

PHILONÒME, I. a daughter of Nyctimus, king of Arcadia, who threw into the Erymanthus two children whom she had by Mars. The children were preserved, and afterwards ascended their grandfather's throne. Plut. in Par.——II. The second wife of Cycnus, the son of Neptune. She became enamoured of Tennes, her husband's son by his first wife, Proclea; and when she accused him of attempts upon her virtue, Cycnus believed the accusation, and ordered Tennes to be thrown into the sea, &c. Paus. 10, c. 14.

PHILŸRA, one of the Oceanides, who was met by Saturn in Thrace, and by whom he had a son, half a man and half a horse, called Chiron. Philyra was so ashamed of giving birth to such a monster, that she entreated the gods to change her nature. She was metamorphosed into the linden tree, called by her name among the Greeks. Hygin. fab. 138.

PHINEUS, I. a son of Agenor, king of Phœnicia, or of Neptune, who became king of Thrace, or, as the greater part of the mythologists support, of Bithynia. He married Cleopatra, the daughter of Boreas, whom some call Cleobula, by whom he had Plexippus and Pandion. After the death of Cleopatra, he married Idæa, the daughter of Dardanus. Idæa, jealous of Cleopatra's children, accused them of attempts upon their father's life and crown, and they were immediately condemned by Phineus to be deprived of their eyes. This cruelty was soon after punished by the gods; Phineus suddenly became blind, and the Harpies were sent by Jupiter to keep him under continual alarm, and to spoil the meats which were placed on his table. He was, some time after, delivered from these dangerous monsters by his brothers-in-law, Zetes and Calais, who pursued them as far as the Strophades. He also recovered his sight by means of the Argonauts, whom he had received with great hospitality, and instructed in the easiest and speediest way by which they could arrive in Colchis. The second wife of Phineus is called by some Dia, Eurytia, Danae, and Idothea. Phineus was killed by Hercules Arg. 2.—Apollod. 1. c. 9, l. 3, c. 15.—Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 19.—Orpheus.—Flacc.——II. The brother of Cepheus, king of Æthiopia. He was going to marry his niece Andromeda, when her father Cepheus was obliged to give her up to be devoured by a sea-moster to appease the resentment of Neptune. Vid. Perseus. Apollod. 2, c. 1 and 4.—Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 1 and 2.—Hygin. fab. 64.

Phlegyas, a son of Mars by Chryse, daughter of Halmus, was king of the Lapithæ in Thessaly. He was father of Ixion and Coronis, to whom Apollo offered violence. When the father heard that his daughter had been so abused, he marched an army against Delphi, and reduced the temple of the god to ashes. This was highly resented; Apollo killed Phlegyas, and placed him in hell, where a huge stone hangs over his head, and keeps him in continual alarms by its appearance of falling every moment. Paus. 9, c. 36.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Pind. Pyth. 3.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 87.—Servius ad Virg. Æn. 6, v. 618.

Phobetor, one of the sons of Somnus, and his principal minister. His office was to assume the shape of serpents and wild beasts, to inspire terror in the minds of men, as his name intimates, (φοβεω). The other two ministers of Somnus were Phantasia and Morpheus. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 640.

Phobos, son of Mars, and god of terror among the ancients, was represented with a lion's head, and sacrifices were offered to him to deprecate his appearance in armies. Plut. in erot.

Phœbas, a name applied to the priestess of Apollo's temple at Delphi. Lucan. 5, v. 128, &c.

Phœbe, I. a name given to Diana, or the moon, on account of the brightness of that luminary. She became, according to Apollodorus, mother of Asteria and Latona. Vid. Diana.——II. A daughter of Leucippus and Philodice, carried away with her sister Hilaira, by Castor and Pollux, as she was going to marry one of the sons of Aphareus. Vid. Lucippides. Apollod. 2, c. 10.—Paus. 2, c. 22.

Phœbigena, a surname of Æsculapius, &c. as being descended from Phœbus. Virg. Æn. v. 773.

Phœbus, a name given to Apollo or the sun. This word expresses the brightness and splendour of that luminary (φοιβος.) Vid. Apollo.

Phœnix. Vid. Part II. A son of Agenor, by a nymph who was called Telephassa, according to Apollodorus and Moschus, or according to others, Epimedusa, Perimeda, or Agriope. He was, like his brothers, Cadmus and Cilix, sent by his father in pursuit of his sister Europa, whom Jupiter had carried away under the form of a bull, and when his inquiries proved unsuccessful, he settled in a country, which, according to some, was from him called Phœnicia. From him, as some suppose, the Carthaginians were called Pœni. Apollod. 3.—Hygin. fab. 178.

Pholus, one of the Centaurs, son of Silenus and Melia, or, according to others, of Ixion and the Cloud. He kindly entertained Hercules when he was going against the boar of Erymanthus, but he refused to give him wine, as that which he had belonged to the rest of the Centaurs. Hercules, upon this, without ceremony, broke the casks and drank the wine. The smell of the liquor drew the Centaurs from the neighbourhood to the house of Pholus, but Hercules stopped them when they forcibly entered the habitation of his friend, and killed the greatest part of them. Pholus gave the dead a decent funeral, but he mortally wounded himself with one of the arrows which were poisoned with the venom of the hydra, and which he attempted to extract from the body of one of the Centaurs. Hercules, unable to cure him, buried him when dead, and called the mountain where his remains were deposited by the name of Pholoe. Apollod. 1.—Paus. 3.—Virg. G. 2, v. 456. Æn. 8, v. 294.—Diod. 4.—Ital. 1.—Lucan. 3, 6 and 7.—Stat. Theb. 2.

Phorbas, a son of Lapithus, who married Hyrmine, the daughter of Epeus, by whom he had Actor. Pelops, according to Diodorus, shared his kingdom with Phorbas, who also, says the same historian, established himself at Rhodes. at the head of a colony from Elis and Thessaly, by order of the oracle, which promised, by his means only, deliverance from the numerous serpents which infested the island. Diod. 2.—Paus. 5, c. 1.

Phorcus, or Phorcys, a sea-deity, son of Pontus and Terra, who married his sister Ceto, by whom he had the Gorgons, the dragon that kept the apples of the Hesperides, and other monsters. Hesiod. Theogn.—Apollod.

Phoroneus, the god of a river of Peloponnesus, of the same name. He was son of the river Inachus by Melissa, and he was the second king of Argos. He married a nymph called Cerdo, or Laodice, by whom he had Apis, from whom Argolis was called Apia, and Niobe, the first woman of whom Jupiter became enamoured. Phoroneus taught his subjects the utility of laws, and the advantages of a social life and of friendly intercourse, whence the inhabitants of Argolis are often called Phoronæi. Pausanias relates that Phoroneus, with the Cephisus, Asterion, and Inachus, were appointed as umpires in the quarrel between Neptune and Juno concerning their right of patronising Argolis. Juno gained the preference; upon which Neptune, in a fit of resentment, dried up all the four rivers, whose decision he deemed partial. He afterwards restored them to their dignity and consequence. Phoroneus was the first who raised a temple to Juno. He received divine honours after death. His temple still existed at Argos, under Antoninus the Roman emperor. Paus. 2, c. 15, &c.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Hygin. fab. 143.

Phyleus, a son of Augeas. He was placed on his father's throne by Hercules.

Phyllis, a daughter of Sithon, or, according to others, of Lycurgus, king of Thrace, who hospitably received Demophoon the son of Theseus, who, at his return from the Trojan war, had stopped on her coasts. She became enamoured of him, and did not find him insensible to her passion. After some months of mutual tenderness and affection, Demophoon set sail for Athens, where his domestic affairs recalled him. He promised faithfully to return as soon as a month was expired; but either his dislike for Phyllis, or the irreparable situation of his affairs, obliged him to violate his engagement, and the queen, grown desperate on account of his absence, hanged herself, or, according to others threw herself down a precipice into the sea, and perished. Her friends raised a tomb over her body, where there grew up certain trees, whose leaves, at a particular season of the year, suddenly became wet, as if shedding tears for the death of Phyllis. According to an old tradition mentioned by Servius, Virgil's commentator, Phyllis was changed by the gods into an almond tree, which is called Phylla by the Greeks. Some days after this metamorphosis, Demophoon revisited Thrace, and when he heard of the fate of Phyllis, he ran and clasped the tree, which, though at that time stripped of its leaves, suddenly shot forth and blossomed, as if still sensible of tenderness and love. The absence of Demophoon from the house of Phyllis has given rise to a beautiful epistle of Ovid, supposed to have been written by the Thracian queen about the fourth month after her lover's departure. Ovid. Heriod. 2. de Art. Am. 2, v. 353. Trist. 9, 437.—Hygin. fab. 59.

PHYLLIUS, a young Bœotian, uncommonly fond of Cygnus, the son of Hyria, a woman of Bœotia. Cygnus slighted his passion, and told him, that to obtain a return of affection, he must previously destroy an enormous lion, take alive two large vultures, and sacrifice on Jupiter's altars a wild bull that infested the country. This he easily effected by means of artifice, and by the advice of Hercules he forgot his partiality for the son of Hyria. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 372.—Nicand in Heter. 3.

PICUMNUS, and PILUMNUS, different names of a deity at Rome, who presided over the auspices that were required before the celebration of nuptials. Pilumnus was supposed to patronise children. The manuring of lands was first invented by him, from which reason he is called Sterquilinius. Pilumnus is also invoked as the god of bakers and millers, as he is said to have first invented how to grind corn. Turnus boasted of being one of his lineal descendants. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 4.—Varro.

PICUS, a king of Latium, son of Saturn, who married Venilia, who is also called Canens, by whom he had Faunus. He was tenderly loved by the goddess Pomona, and he returned a mutual affection. As he was one day hunting in the woods, he was met by Circe, who became deeply enamoured of him, and who changed him into a woodpecker, called by the name of picus among the Latins. His wife Venilia was so disconsolate when informed of his death, that she pined away. Some suppose that Picus was the son of Pilumnus, and that he gave out prophecies to this subjects, by means of a favourite woodpecker; from which circumstance originated the fable of his being metamorphosed into a bird. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 48, 171, &c.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 320, &c.

PIERIDES, I. a name given to the Muses, either because they were born in Pieria, in Thessaly, or because they were supposed by some to be the daughters of Pierus, a king of Macedonia, who settled in Bœotia.——II. Also the daughters of Pierus, who challenged the Muses to a trial in music, in which they were conquered. and changed to magpies. It may, perhaps, be supposed that the victorious Muses assumed the name of the conquered daughters of Pierus and ordered themselves to be called Pierides in the same manner as Minerva was called Pallas because she had killed the giant Pallas. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 300.

PIERUS, a rich man of Thessaly, whose nine daughters, called Pierides, challenged the Muses, and were changed into magpies when conquered. Paus. 9, c. 29.

PIETAS, a deity among the Romans. Acilius Glabrio first erected a temple to this new divinity, on the spot where a woman had fed with her own milk her aged father, who had been imprisoned by order of the senate, and deprived of all aliment. Cic. de Div. 1.—Val. Max. 5, c. 4.—Plin. 7, c. 36.

PILUMNUS. Vid. Picumnus.

PINARIUS and POTITIUS, two old men of Arcadia, who came with Evander to Italy. They were instructed by Hercules, who visited the court of Evander, how they were to offer sacrifices to his divinity, in the morning, and in the evening, immediately at sunset. The morning sacrifice they punctually performed, but on the evening, Potitius was obliged to offer the sacrifice alone, as Pinarius neglected to come till after the appointed time. This negligence offended Hercules, and he ordered, that for the future, Potitius and his descendants should preside over the sacrifices, but that Pinarius, with his posterity should wait upon the priests as servants when the sacrifices were annually offered to him on mount Aventine. This was religiously observed till the age of Appius Claudius, who persuaded the Potitii, by a large bribe, to discontinue their sacred office, and to have the ceremony performed by slaves. For this negligence, as the Latin authors observe, the Potitii were deprived of sight, and the family became, a little time after, totally extinct. Liv. 1, c. 7.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 269, &c.—Victor de orig. 8.

PION, one of the descendants of Hercules, who built Pionia, near the Caycus in Mysia. It is said that smoke issued from his tomb as often as sacrifices were offered to him. Paus. 9, c. 18.

PIRENE, I. a daughter of Danaus.——II. A daughter of Œbalaus, or, according to others, of the Achelous. She had by Neptune two sons, called Leches and Cenchrius, who gave their name to two of the harbours of Corinth. Pirene was so disconsolate at the death of her son Cenchrius, who had been killed by Diana, that she pined away, and was dissolved, by her continual weeping, into a fountain of the same name, which was still seen at Corinth in the age of Pausanias. The fountain Pirene was sacred to the Muses, and, according to some, the horse Pegasus was then drinking some of its waters when Bellerophon took it to go and conquer the Chimæra. Paus. 2, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 240.

PIRITHOUS, a son of Ixion and the Cloud, or, according to others, of Dia, the daughter of Deioneus. Some make him son of Dia, by Jupiter. He married Hippodamia. Vid. Theseus.

PISTOR, a surname given to Jupiter by the Romans, signifying baker, because, when their city was taken by the Gauls, the god persuaded them to throw down loaves from the Tarpeian hill where they were besieged, that the enemy might from thence suppose that they were not in want of provisions, though, in reality, they were near surrendering through famine. This deceived the Gauls, and they soon after raised the siege. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 350, 394, &c.

PITHO, called also Suada, the goddess of persuasion among the Greeks and Romans, supposed to be the daughter of Mercury and Venus. A caduceus, as a symbol of persuasion, appears at her feet, with the writings of Demosthenes and Cicero, the two most celebrated among the ancients, who understood how to command the attention of their audience, and to rouse and animate their various passions.

PITHYS, a nymph beloved by Pan. Boreas dashed her against a rock, and she was changed into a pine tree.

PITTHÉUS, a king of Trœzene in Argolis, son of Pelops and Hippodamia. He was universally admired for his learning, wisdom, and application; he publicly taught in a school at Trœzene, and even composed a book, which was seen by Pausanias the geographer. He gave his daughter Æthra in marriage to Ægeus, king of Athens, and he himself took particular care of the youth and education of his grandson Theseus. He was buried at Trœzene, which he had founded, and on his tomb were seen, for many ages, three seats of white marble, on which he sat, with two other judges, whenever he gave laws to his subjects or settled their disputes. Paus. 1 and 2.—Plut. in Thes.—Strab. 8.

PLEIÓNE, one of the Oceanides, who married Atlas, king of Mauretania, by whom she had twelve daughters, and a son called Hyas. Seven of the daughters were changed into a constellation called Pleiades, and the rest into another called Hyades. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 84.

PLEMNEUS, a king of Sicyon, son of Peratus. His children always died as soon as born, till Ceres pitying his misfortune, offered herself as a nurse to his wife. The child lived by the care and protection of the goddess, and Plemneus was no sooner acquainted with the dignity of his nurse than he raised her a temple. Paus. 2, c. 5 and 11.

PLEURON. Vid. Part II.

PLEXIPPUS, a son of Thestius, brother to Althæa, the wife of Œneus. Vid. Althæa and Meleager.

PLUTO, a son of Saturn and Ops, inherited his father's kingdom with his brothers, Jupiter and Neptune. He received as his lot the kingdom of hell, and whatever lies under the earth, and as such he became the god of the infernal regions, of death and funerals. From his functions, and the place he inhabited, he received different names. He was called Dis, Hades or Ades, Orcus, &c. As the place of his residence was obscure and gloomy, all the goddesses refused to marry him; but he determined to obtain by force what was denied to his solicitations. As he once visited the island of Sicily, after a violent earthquake, he saw Proserpine, the daughter of Ceres, gathering flowers in the plains of Enna, with a crowd of female attendants. He became enamoured of her, and immediately carried her away upon his chariot drawn by four horses. To make this retreat more unknown, he opened himself a passage through the earth, by striking it with his trident in the lake of Cyane in Sicily, or, according to others, on the borders of the Cephisus in Attica. Proserpine called upon her attendants for help, but in vain; and she became the wife of her ravisher and the queen of hell. Pluto is generally represented as holding a trident with two teeth; he has also keys in his hand, to intimate that whoever enters his kingdom can never return. He is looked upon as a hardhearted and inexorable god, with a grim and dismal countenance; and for that reason no temples were raised to his honour as to the rest of the superior gods. Black victims, and particularly a bull, were the only sacrifices which were offered to him, and their blood was not sprinkled on the altars, or received in vessels, as at other sacrifices, but it was permitted to run down into the earth, as if it were to penetrate as far as the realms of the god. The Syracusans yearly sacrificed to him black bulls, near the fountain of Cyane, where, according to the received traditions, he had disappeared with Proserpine. Among plants, the cypress, the narcissus, and the maiden-hair, were sacred to him, as also every thing which was deemed inauspicious, particularly the number two. According to some of the ancients, Pluto sat on a throne of sulphur, from which issued the rivers Lethe, Cocytus, Phlegethon, and Acheron. The dog Cerberus watched at his feet, the harpies hovered round him, Proserpine sat on his left hand, and near to the goddess stood the Eumenides, with their heads covered with snakes. The Parcæ occupied the right, and they each held in their hands the symbols of their office, the distaff, the spindle, and the scissors. Pluto is called by some the father of the Eumenides. During the war of the gods and the Titans, the Cyclops made a helmet, which rendered the bearer invisible, and gave it to Pluto. Perseus was armed with it when he conquered the Gorgons. Hesiod. Theog.—Homer. Il.—Apollod. 1, &c.—Hygin. fab. 155. P. A. 2.—Stat. Theb. 8.—Diod. 3.—Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 6.—Paus. 2, c. 36.—Orpheus. Hymn. 17, &c.—*Cic. de Nat. PLUTUS, son of Jasion or Jasius, by Ceres, the goddess of corn, has been confounded by many of the mythologists with Pluto, though plainly distinguished from him as being the god of riches. He was brought up by the goddess of peace, and on that account Pax was represented at Athens as holding the god of wealth in her lap. The Greeks spoke of him as of a fickle divinity. They represented him as blind, because he distributed riches indiscriminately; he was lame, because he came slow and gradually; but had wings, to intimate that he flew away with more velocity than he approached mankind. Lucian. in Tim. Paus. 9, c. 16 and 26.—Hygin. P. A.—Aristoph. in Plut. Diod. 5.—Hesiod. Th. 970.—Dion. Hal. 1, c. 53.

PLUVIUS, a surname of Jupiter as god of rain. He was invoked by that name among the Romans, whenever the earth was parched up by continual heat, and was in want of refreshing showers. He had an altar in the temple on the capitol. Tibull. 1, el. 7, v. 26.

Podalirius, a son of Æsculapius and Epione. He was one of the pupils of the Centaur Chiron, and he made himself under him such a master of medicine, that during the Trojan war, the Greeks invited him to their camp, to stop a pestilence which had baffled the skill of all their physicians. Some, however, suppose that he went to the Trojan war, not in the capacity of a physician in the Grecian army, but as a warrior, attended by his brother Machaon, in 30 ships with soldiers from Œcalia, Ithome, and Trica. At his return from the Trojan war, Podalirius was shipwrecked on the coast of Caria, where he cured of the falling sickness and married a daughter of Damœtas, the king of the place. He fixed his habitation there, and built two towns, one of which he called Syrna, by the name of his wife. The Carians, after his death, built him a temple, and paid him divine honours. Dictys Cret.—Q. Smyrn. 6 and 9.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 2.—Tzetz. el. 6.—Paus. 3.

Pollux, a son of Jupiter by Leda the wife of Tyndarus. He was brother to Castor. Vid. Castor.

Polybus, or Polĭbus, a king of Corinth, who married Peribœa, whom some have called Merope. He was son of Mercury by Chthonophyle, the daughter of Sicyon, king of Sicyon. He permitted his wife, who had no children to adopt and educate as her own son, Œdipus, who had been found by his shepherds exposed in the woods. He had a daughter called Lysianassa, whom he gave in marriage to Talaus, son of Bias, king of Argos. As he had no male child, he left his kingdom to Adrastus, who had been banished from his throne, and who had fled to Corinth for protection. Hygin. fab. 66. Paus. 2, c. 6.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Seneca in Œdip. 812.

Polybŏtes, one of the giants who made war against Jupiter. He was killed by Neptune, who crushed him under a part of the island of Cos, as he was walking across the Ægean. Paus. 1, c. 2.—Hygin. in præ fab.

Polybus, a king of Corinth. Vid. Polybius.

Polycàon, a son of Lelex, who succeeded his brother Myles. He received divine honours after death, with his wife Messene, at Lacedæmon, where he had reigned. Paus. 4, c. 1, &c.

Polydămas. Vid. Part II.

Polydectes, a son of Magnes, king of the island of Seriphos. He received with great kindness Danae and her son Perseus, who had been exposed on the sea by Acrisius. Vid. Perseus. He took particular care of the education of Perseus; but when he became enamoured of Danae, he removed him from his kingdom, apprehensive of his resentment. Some time after he paid his addresses to Danae, and when she rejected him, he prepared to offer her violence. Danae fled to the altar of Minerva for protection, and Dictys, the brother of Polydectes, who had himself saved her from the sea-waters, opposed her ravisher, and armed himself in her defence. At this critical moment Perseus arrived, and with Medusa's head he turned into stones Polydectes and the associates of his guilt. The crown of Seriphos was given to Dictys, who had shown himself so active in the cause of innocence. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 242.—Hygin. fab. 63, &c.

Polydŏra, 1. a daughter of Peleus, king of Thessaly, by Antigone, the daughter of Eurytion. She married the river Sperchius, by whom she had Mnestheus. Apollod.——II. A daughter of Meleager, king of Calydon, who married Protesilaus. She killed herself when she heard that her husband was dead. The wife of Protesilaus is more commonly called Laodamia. Vid. Protesilaus. Paus. 4, c. 2.

Polydorus. Vid. Part II.

Polyhymnia, and Polymnia, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over singing and rhetorie, and was deemed the inventress of harmony. She was represented veiled in white, holding a sceptre in her left hand, and with her right raised up, as if ready to harangue. She had a crown of jewels on her head. Hesiod. Theog. 75 and 915.—Plut. in Symp.—Horat. 1, od. 1.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 9 and 53.

Polymēde, a daughter of Autolycus, who married Æson, by whom she had Jason. She survived her husband only a few days. Apollod. 1, c. 13.

Polymnestor. Vid. Part II.

Polȳnices, a son of Œdipus and Jocasta. Vid. Etiocles.

Polypēmon, Procrustes. Ovid calls him father of Procrustes. Vid. Procrustes.

Polyphēmus, a celebrated Cyclops, king of all the Cyclops in Sicily, and son of Neptune and Thoosa, the daughter of Phorcys. He is represented as a monster of strength, of a tall stature, and one eye in the middle of the forehead. He fed upon human flesh, and kept his flocks on the coast of Sicily, when Ulysses, at his return from the Trojan war, was driven there. The Grecian prince, with twelve of his companions, visited the coast, and were seized by the Cyclops, who confined them in his cave, and daily devoured two of them. Ulysses would have shared the fate of his companions, had he not intoxicated the Cyclops, and put out his eye with a firebrand while he was asleep. Polyphemus was awakened by the sudden pain, he stopped the entrance of his cave, but Ulysses made his escape by creeping between the legs of the rams of the Cyclops, as they were led out to feed on the mountains. Polyphemus became enamoured of Galatæa, but his addresses were disregarded, and the nymph shunned his presence. The Cyclops was more earnest; and when he saw Galatæa surrender herself to the pleasures of Acis, he crushed his rival with a piece of a broken rock. Theocrit. 1.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 772.—Homer. Od. 19.—Eurip. in Cyclop.—Hygin. fab. 125.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 619, &c.

Polyxena. Vid. Part II.

Polyxo, a priestess of Apollo's temple in Lemnos. She was also nurse to Queen Hypsipyle. It was by her advice that the Lemnian women murdered all their husbands. Apollon. 1.—Flacc. 2.—Hygin. fab. 15. Vid. Part II.

Pomōna, a nymph at Rome, who was supposed to preside over gardens, and to be the goddess of all sorts of fruit-trees. She had a temple at Rome, and a regular priest called Flamens Pomonalis, who offered sacrifices to her divinity for the preservation of fruit. Many of the gods of the country endeavoured to gain her affection, but she received their addresses with coldness. Vertumnus was the only one who, by assuming different shapes, and introducing himself into her company, under the form of an old woman, prevailed upon her to break her vow of celibacy and to marry him. This deity was unknown among the Greeks. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 628, &c.—Festus de V. sig.

Pompilus, a fisherman of Ionia. He carried into Miletus, Ocyroe, the daughter of Chesias, of whom Apollo was enamoured; but before he had reached the shore, the god changed the boat into a rock, Pompilius into a fish of the same name, and carried away Ocyroe. Plin. 6, c. 29, l. 9, c. 15, l. 32, c. 11.

Pontus, an ancient deity, the same as Oceanus. Apollod. 1, c. 2.

Porphyrion, a son of Cœlus and Terra, one of the giants who made war against Jupiter. He was so formidable, that Jupiter, to conquer him, inspired him with love for Juno, and while the giant endeavoured to obtain his wishes, he, with the assistance of Hercules, overpowered him. Horat. 3, od. 4.—Mart. 13, ep. 78.—Apolled. 1, c. 6.

Porus, the god of Plenty at Rome. He was son of Metis or Prudence. Plato. Vid. Part II.

Postverta, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the painful travails of women. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 633.

Praxidice, a goddess among the Greeks, who presided over the execution of enterprises, and who punished all evil actions. Paus. 9, c. 33.

Praxis, a surname of Venus at Megara. Paus. 1, c. 43.

Praxithea, a daughter of Phrasimus and Diogenea. She married Erechtheus, king of Athens, by whom she had Cecrops, Pandarus, and Metion, and four daughters, Procis, Creusa Chthonia, and Crithyia. Apollod. 3. c. 15.

Priapus, an obscene deity among the ancients, son of Venus by Mercury or Adonis; or, according to the more received opinion, by Bacchus. He was born at Lampsacus. Priapus was so deformed in all his limbs, by means of Juno, that the mother, ashamed to have given birth to such a monster, ordered him to be exposed on the mountains. His life, however, was preserved by shepherds. He soon became a favourite of the people of Lampsacus, but was at length expelled by the inhabitants on account of his licentiousness. This violence was punished by the son of Venus, who was recalled, and temples erected to his honour. Festivals were also celebrated; and the people, naturally idle and indolent, gave themselves up to every impurity during the celebration. His worship was also introduced in Rome; but the Romans revered him more as god of orchards and gardens than as the patron of licentiousness. A crown, painted with different colours, was offered to him in the spring, and in the summer a garland of ears of corn. He is generally represented with a human face and the ears of a goat; he holds a stick in his hand, with which he terrifies birds, as also a club to drive away thieves, and a scythe to prune the trees, and cut down corn. He was crowned with the leaves of the vine, and sometimes with laurel or rocket. Priapus is often distinguished by the epithet of phallus, fascinus, Itypballus, or ruber, or *rubicundus. Procne, a daughter of Pandion, king of Athens, by Zeuxippe. She married Tereus king of Thrace, by whom she had a son called Itylus, or Itys. Vid. Philomela.

Procris, a daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens. She married Cephalus. Vid. Cephalus. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 435.

Procrustes, a famous robber of Attica, killed by Theseus, near the Cephisus. He tied travellers on a bed, and if their length exceeded that of the bed, he used to cut it off, but if they were shorter he had them stretched to make their length equal to it. He is called by some Damastes and Polypemon. Ovid. Heroid. 2, v. 59. Met. 7, v. 43.—Paus. in Thes.

Proetides, the daughters of Prœtus, king of Argolis, were three in number, Lysippe, Iphinoe, Iphianassa. They became insane for neglecting the worship of Bacchus, or, according to others, for preferring themselves to Juno, and they ran about the fields believing themselves to be cows, and flying away not to be harnessed to the plough or to the chariot. Prœtus applied to Melampus to cure his daughters of their insanity, but he refused to employ him when he demanded the third part of his kingdom as a reward. This neglect of Prœtus was punished, the insanity became contagious, and the monarch at last promised Melampus two parts of his kingdom and one of his daughters, if he would restore them and the Argian women to their senses. Melampus consented, and after he had wrought the cure, he married the most beautiful of the Proetides. Some have called them Lysippe, Ipponoe, and Cyrianassa. Apollod. 2, c. 2.—*Virg. Proetus. Vid. Part II.

Prometheus, a son of Iapetus by Clymene, one of the Oceanides. He was brother to Atlas, Menœtius, and Epimetheus; and surpassed all mankind in cunning and fraud. He sacrificed two bulls, and filled their skins, one with the flesh and the other with the bones, and asked the father of the gods which of the two he preferred as an offering. Jupiter became the dupe of his artifice, and chose the bones; and from that time the priests of the temples were ever after ordered to burn the whole victims on the altars, the flesh and the bones altogether. To punish Prometheus and the rest of mankind, Jupiter took fire away from the earth, but the son of Iapetus climbed the heavens by the assistance of Minerva, and stole fire from the chariot of the sun, which he brought down upon the earth at the end of a ferula. This provoked Jupiter the more; he ordered Vulcan to make a woman of clay, and after he had given her life, he sent her to Prometheus, with a box of the richest and most valuable presents which he had received from the gods. Vid. Pandora. Prometheus, who suspected Jupiter, took no notice of Pandora or her box, but he made his brother Epimetheus marry her; and the god, now more irritated, ordered Mercury, or Vulcan according to Æschylus, to carry this artful mortal to mount Caucasus, and there tie him to a rock, where, for 30,000 years, a vulture was to feed upon his liver, which was never diminished though continually devoured. He was delivered from this painful confinement about thirty years afterwards by Hercules, who killed the bird of prey. According to Apollodorus, Prometheus made the first man and woman that ever were upon the earth, with clay, which he animated by means of the fire which he had stolen from heaven. On this account, therefore, the Athenians raised him an altar in the grove of Academus, where they yearly celebrated games in his honour. *Hesiod. Pronuba, a surname of Juno, because she presided over marriages. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 166.

Propœtides, some women of Cyprus, severely punished by Venus, whose divinity they had despised. The poets have feigned that they were changed into stones, on account of their insensibility to every virtuous sentiment. Justin. 18, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 238.

Propylea, a surname of Diana. She had a temple at Eleusis in Attica.

Prosclystius, a surname of Neptune among the Greeks. Paus. 2.

Proserpina, a daughter of Ceres by Jupiter, called by the Greeks Persephone. Proserpine made Sicily the place of her residence, and delighted herself with the beautiful views, the flowery meadows, and limpid streams, which surrounded the plains of Enna. In this solitary retreat, as she amused herself with her female attendants in gathering flowers, Pluto carried her away into the infernal regions, of which she became the queen. Ceres soon learned from the nymph Arethusa that her daughter had been carried away by Pluto, and immediately she repaired to Jupiter, and demanded of him to punish the ravisher. Jupiter said that she might return on earth if she had not taken any aliment in the infernal regions. Her return, however, was impossible. Proserpine, as she walked in the Elysian fields, had gathered a pomegranate from a tree and eaten it. Jupiter to appease the resentment of Ceres, and sooth her grief, permitted that Proserpine should remain six months with Pluto in the infernal regions, and that she should spend the rest of the year with her mother on earth. As queen of hell and wife of Pluto, Proserpine presided over the death of mankind; and, according to the opinion of the ancients, no one could die, if the goddess herself, or Atropos, her minister, did not cut off one of the hairs from the head. From this superstitious belief, it was usual to cut off some of the hair of the deceased, and to strew it at the door of the house, as an offering for Proserpine. The Sicilians were very particular in their worship to Proserpine, and as they believed that the fountain Cyane had risen from the earth at the very place where Pluto had opened himself a passage, they annually sacrificed there a bull, of which they suffered the blood to run into the water. Proserpine was universally worshipped by the ancients, and she was known by the different names of *Theogamia, Libitina, Hecate, Juno inferna, Anthesphoria, &c. Protesilaus, a king of part of Thessaly, son of Iphiclus, originally called Iolaus, grandson of Phylacus, and brother to Alcimede, the mother of Jason. He married Laodamia, the daughter of Acastus, and, some time after, he departed with the rest of the Greeks for the Trojan war with 40 sail. He was the first of the Greeks who set foot on the Trojan shore, and, as such, he was doomed by the oracle to perish; therefore he was killed, as soon as he had leaped from his ship, by Æneas or Hector. Homer has not mentioned the person who killed him. Vid. Laodamia. Protesilaus has received the patronymic of Phylacides, either because he was descended from Phylacus, or because he was a native of Phylace. He was buried on the Trojan shore, and, according to Pliny, there were near his tomb certain trees which grew to an extraordinary height, which, as soon as they could be discovered and seen from Troy, immediately withered and decayed, and afterwards grew up again to their former height, and suffered the same vicissitude. Homer. Il. 2, v. 205.—Ovid. Met. 12, fab. 1.—Heroid. 13, v. 17.—Propert. 1, el. 19.—Hygin. fab. 103, &c.

Proteus, a sea-deity, son of Oceanus and Tethys, or, according to some, of Neptune and Phœnice. He had received the gift of prophecy from Neptune, because he had tended the monsters of the sea; and from his knowledge of futurity mankind received the greatest services. He usually resided in the Carpathian Sea, and like the rest of the gods, he reposed himself on the seashore, where such as wished to consult him generally resorted. He was difficult of access, and when consulted he refused to give answers, by immediately assuming different shapes, and, if not properly secured in fetters, eluding the grasp in the form of a tiger or a lion, or disappearing in a flame of fire, a whirlwind, or a rushing stream. Aristæus and Menelaus were in the number of those who consulted him, as also Hercules. Some suppose that he was originally king of Egypt, known among his subjects by the name of Cetes; and they assert that he had two sons, Telegonus, and Polygonus, who were both killed by Hercules. He had also some daughters, among whom were Cabira, Eidothea, and Rhetia. Homer. Od. 4, v. 360.—Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 10. Am. el. 12, v. 36.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 243.—*Virg. Protogenea, a daughter of Calydon, by Æolia the daughter of Amythaon. She had a son called Oxilus by Mars. Apollod. 1.

Protogenia, I. a daughter of Deucalion and Pyrrha. She was beloved by Jupiter, by whom she had Æthlius, the father of Endymion. Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Paus. 5, c. 1. Hygin. fab. 155.——II. Another. Vid. Protogenea.

Psamathe, I. one of the Nereides, mother of Phocus by Æacus, king of Ægina. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 398.—Flacc. v. 364.——II. A daughter of Crotopus, king of Argos. She became mother of Linus by Apollo, and, to conceal her shame from her father she exposed her child, which was found by dogs and torn to pieces. Paus. 1, c. 43.

Psyche, a nymph whom Cupid married. Venus put her to death because she had robbed the world of her son; but Jupiter at the request of Cupid, granted immortality to Psyche. The word signifies the soul, and this personification of Psyche, first mentioned by Apuleius, is posterior to the Augustan age, though still it is connected with ancient mythology. Psyche is generally represented with the wings of a butterfly, to intimate the lightness of the soul, of which the butterfly is the symbol.

Pudicitia, a goddess who, as her name implies, presided over chastity. She had two temples at Rome. Festus. de V. sig.—Liv. 10, c. 7.

Pygmæi, a nation of dwarfs, in the extremest parts of India, or, according to others, in Æthiopia. Some authors affirm that they were no more than one foot high, and that they built their houses with egg-shells. Aristotle says that they lived in holes under the earth, and that they came out in the harvest-time with hatchets to cut down the corn as if to fell a forest. They went on goats and lambs of proportionable stature to themselves, to make war against certain birds whom some call cranes, which came there yearly from Scythia to plunder them. They were originally governed by Gerana, a princess, who was changed into a crane, for boasting herself fairer than Juno. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 90.—Homer. Il. 3.—Strab. 7.—Arist. Anim. 8, c. 12.—Juv. 13, v. 186.—Plin. 4, &c.—Mela, 3, c. 8.—Suet. in Aug. 83.—Philostr Icon. 2, c. 22, mentions that Hercules once fell asleep in the deserts of Africa, after he had conquered Antæus, and that he was suddenly awakened by an attack which had been made upon his body by an army of these Liliputians, who discharged their arrows with great fury upon his arms and legs. The hero, pleased with their courage, wrapped the greatest number of them in the skin of the Nemæan lion, and carried them to Eurystheus, to whom the art and the hatred of Juno had rendered him subject.

Pygmălion. Vid. Part II.

Pylădes. Vid. Part II.

Pyracmon, one of Vulcan's workmen in the forges of mount Ætna. The name is derived from two Greek words, which signify fire and an anvil. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 425.

Pyrămus, a youth of Babylon, who became enamoured of Thisbe, a beautiful virgin, who dwelt in the neighbourhood. The flame was mutual, and the two lovers, whom their parents forbad to marry, regularly received each other's addresses through the chink of a wall which separated their houses. After the most solemn vows of sincerity, they both agreed to elude the vigilance of their friends, and to meet one another at the tomb of Ninus, under a white mulberry tree, without the walls of Babylon. Thisbe came first to the appointed place, but the sudden arrival of a lioness frightened her away; and as she fled into a neighbouring cave, she dropped her veil, which the lioness found and besmeared with blood. Pyramus soon arrived; he found Thisbe's veil all bloody, and concluding that she had been torn to pieces by the wild beasts of the place, he stabbed himself with his sword. Thisbe, when her fears were vanished, returned from the cave, and at the sight of the dying Pyramus, she fell upon the sword which still reeked with his blood. This tragical scene happened under a white mulberry tree, which, as the poets mention, was stained with the blood of the lovers, and ever after bore fruit of the colour of blood. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 55, &c.—Hygin. fab. 243. Vid. Part I.

Pyrenæus, a king of Thrace, who, during a shower of rain, gave shelter in his house to the nine Muses, and attempted to offer them violence. The goddesses upon this took to their wings and flew away. Pyrenæus, who attempted to follow them, as if he had wings, threw himself down from the top of a tower and was killed. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 274.

Pyrēnē, I. a daughter of Bebrycius, king of the southern parts of Spain. Hercules offered violence to her before he went to attack Geryon, and she brought into the world a serpent, which so terrified her that she fled into the woods, where she was torn to pieces by wild beasts. ——II. A nymph, mother of Cycnus by Mars. Apollod. Vid. Part II.

Pyrodes, a son of Cilix, said to be the first who discovered, and applied to human purposes, the fire concealed in flints. Plin. 7, c. 56.

Pyrrha, a daughter of Epimethus and Pandora, who married Deucalion, the son of Prometheus, who reigned in Thessaly. Vid. Deucalion. Pyrrha became mother of Amphictyon, Hellen, and Protogenea, by Deucalion. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 350, &c.—Hygin. fab. 153.—Apollon. Rhod. 3, v. 1085.

Pythius, a surname of Apollo, which he had received for his having conquered the serpent Python, or because he was worshipped at Delphi; called also Pytho. Macrob. 1, sat. 17.—Propert. 2, el. 23, v. 16.

Python, a celebrated serpent, sprung from the mud and stagnated waters which remained on the surface of the earth after the deluge of Deucalion. Some, however, suppose that it was produced from the earth by Juno, and sent by the goddess to persecute Latona. Apollo, as soon as he was born, attacked the monster and killed him with his arrows, and in commemoration of the victory which he had obtained, he instituted the celebrated Pythian games. Strab. 8.—Paus. 2, c. 7, l. 10, c. 6.—Hygin.—*Ovid. Q.

Quadrātus, a surname given to Mercury, because some of his statues were square. The number 4, according to Plutarch, was sacred to Mercury, because he was born on the 4th day of the month. Plut. in Sympos. 9.

Quadrifrons, or Quadriceps, a surname of Janus, because he was represented with four heads. He had a temple on the Tarpeian rock, raised by L. Catulus.

Quirinus, a surname of Mars among the Romans. This name was also given to Romulus when he had been made a god by his superstitious subjects. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 475.

R.

Redicŭlus, a deity, whose name is derived from the word redire, (to return.) Vid. Ædiculæ Redicula, Part I.

Rhacius, a Cretan prince, the first of that nation who entered Ionia with a colony. He seized Claros, of which he became the sovereign. He married Manto, the daughter of Tiresias, who had been seized on his coasts. Paus. 7, c. 3.

Rhadamanthus, a son of Jupiter and Europa. He was born in Crete, which he abandoned about the 30th year of his age. He passed into some of the Cyclades, where he reigned with so much justice and impartiality, that the ancients have said he became one of the judges of hell, and that he was employed in the infernal regions in obliging the dead to confess their crimes, and in punishing them for their offences. Rhadamanthus reigned not only over some of the Cyclades, but over many of the Greek cities of Asia. Paus. 8, c. 53.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 435.—Diod. 5.—Plato.—Homer. Il. 4, v. 564.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 566.

Rhamnusia, a name of Nemesis.

Rhea, I. a daughter of Cœlus and Terra, who married Saturn, by whom she had Vesta, Ceres, Juno, Pluto, Neptune, &c. Her husband, however, devoured them all as soon as born, as he had succeeded to the throne with the solemn promise that he would raise no male children, or, according to others, because he had been informed by an oracle that one of his sons would dethrone him. To stop the cruelty of her husband, Rhea consulted her parents, and was advised to impose upon him, or perhaps to fly into Crete. Accordingly, when she brought forth, the child was immediately concealed, and Saturn devoured up a stone which his wife had given him as her own child. The fears of Saturn were soon proved to be well founded. A year after, the child, whose name was Jupiter, became so strong and powerful, that he drove his father from his throne. Rhea has been confounded by the mythologists with some of the other goddesses, and many have supposed that she was the same divinity that received adoration under the various names of Bona Dea, Cybele, Dindymena, Magna Mater, Ceres, Vesta, Titæa, and Terra, Tellus, and Ops. Vid. Cybele, Ceres, Vesta, &c. Rhea, after the expulsion of her husband from his throne, followed him to Italy, where he established a kingdom. Her benevolence in this part of Europe was so great, that the golden age of Saturn is often called the age of Rhea. Hesiod. Theog.—Orpheus, in Hymn.—Homer. ib.—Æschyl. Prom.—*Euripid. Rhesus, a king of Thrace, son of the Strymon and Terpsichore, or, according to others, of Eioneus by Euterpe. After many warlike exploits and conquests in Europe, he marched to the assistance of Priam, king of Troy, against the Greeks. He was expected with great impatience, as an ancient oracle had declared that Troy should never be taken if the horses of Rhesus drank the waters of the Xanthus, and fed upon the grass of the Trojan plains. This oracle was well known to the Greeks, and therefore two of their best generals, Diomedes and Ulysses, were commissioned by the rest to intercept the Thracian prince. The Greeks entered his camp in the night, slew him, and carried away his horses to their camp. Homer. Il. 10.—Dictys Cret. 2.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 473.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 98.

Rhœsus, a horse of Mezentius, whom his master addressed with the determination to conquer or die when he saw his son Lausus brought lifeless from the battle. This beautiful address is copied from Homer, where likewise Achilles addresses his horses. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 861.

Romilo, or Rumilo, a goddess at Rome, particularly worshipped by husbandmen, as she presided over corn. Her festivals, called Robigalia, were celebrated on the 25th of April, and incense was offered to her, as also the entrails of a sheep and a dog. She was entreated to preserve the corn from blights. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 911.—Virg. G. 1, v. 151.—Varro de L. L. 5, de R. R. 1, c. 1.

Romulus. Vid. Part II.

Sabazius, a surname of Bacchus, as also of Jupiter. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.—Arnob. 4.

Salamis, a daughter of the river Asopus, by Methone. Neptune became enamoured of her, and carried her to an island of the Ægean, which afterwards bore her name, and where she gave birth to Cenchreus. Diod. 4. Vid. Part I.

Salmoneus, a king of Elis, son of Æolus and Enarete, who married Alcidice, by whom he had Tyro. He wished to be called a god, and to receive divine honours from his subjects; therefore, to imitate the thunder, he used to drive his chariot over a brazen bridge, and darted burning torches on every side, as if to imitate the lightning. This impiety provoked Jupiter. Salmoneus was struck with a thunderbolt, and placed in the infernal regions near his brother Sisyphus. Homer. Od. 11, v. 235.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Hygin. fab. 60.—Diod. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 585.

Salus, the goddess of health at Rome, worshipped by the Greeks under the name of Hygieia. Liv. 9 and 10.

Sancus, Sangus, or Sanctus, a deity of the Sabines, introduced among the gods of Rome under the name of Dius Fidius. According to some, Sancus was father to Sabus, or Sabinus, the first king of the Sabines. Ital. 8, v. 421.—Varro. de L. L. 4, c. 10.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 213.

Saron, a king of Troezene, unusually fond of hunting. He was drowned in the sea, where he had swam for some miles in pursuit of a stag. He was made a sea-god by Neptune, and divine honours were paid to him by the Troezenians. It was customary for sailors to offer him sacrifices before they embarked. That part of the sea where he was drowned, was called Saronicus Sinus. Saron built a temple to Diana at Troezene, and instituted festivals to her honour, called from himself Saronia. Paus. 2, c. 30.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 8.

Sarpedon, I. a son of Jupiter, by Europa, the daughter of Agenor. He banished himself from Crete, after he had in vain attempted to make himself king in preference to his elder brother Minos, and he retired to Caria, where he built the town of Miletus. He went to the Trojan war to assist Priam against the Greeks, where he was attended by his friend and companion Glaucus. He was at last killed by Patroclus, after he had made a great slaughter of the enemy, and his body, by order of Jupiter, was conveyed to Lycia, by Apollo, where his friends and relations paid him funeral honours, and raised a monument to perpetuate his valour. According to some mythologists, the brother of King Minos, and the prince who assisted Priam, were two different persons. This last was king of Lycia, and son of Jupiter by Laodamia, the daughter of Bellerophon, and lived about a hundred years after the age of the son of Europa. Apollod. 3, c. 1.—Herodot. 1, c. 173.—Strab. 12.—Homer. Il. 16.——II. A son of Neptune, killed by Hercules for his barbarous treatment of strangers. Vid. Part I.

Saturnius, a name given to Jupiter, Pluto, and Neptune, as being the sons of Saturn.

Saturnus, a son of Cœlus, or Uranus, by Terra, called also Titea, Thea, or Tithela. He was naturally artful, and by means of his mother, revenged himself on his father, and for ever prevented him from increasing the number of his children, whom he had treated with unkindness and confined in the infernal regions. After this, the sons of Cœlus were restored to liberty, and Saturn obtained his father's kingdom by the consent of his brother, provided he did not bring up any male children. Pursuant to this agreement, Saturn always devoured his sons as soon as born, because, as some observe, he dreaded from them a retaliation of his unkindness to his father, till his wife Rhea, unwilling to see her children perish, concealed from her husband the birth of Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto, and instead of the children, she gave him large stones, which he immediately swallowed without perceiving the deceit. Titan was some time after informed that Saturn had concealed his male children, therefore he made war against him, dethroned and imprisoned him with Rhea; and Jupiter, who was secretly educated in Crete, was no sooner grown up, than he flew to deliver his father, and to replace him on his throne. Saturn, unmindful of his son's kindness, conspired against him when he heard that he raised cabals against him; but Jupiter banished him from his throne, and the father fled for safety into Italy, where the country retained the name of Latium, as being the place of his concealment (latco). Janus who was then king of Italy, received Saturn with marks of attention, he made him his partner on the throne; and the king of heaven employed himself in civilizing the barbarous manners of the people of Italy, and in teaching them agriculture and the useful and liberal arts. His reign there was so mild and popular, so beneficent and virtuous, that mankind have called it the golden age, to intimate the happiness and tranquillity which the earth then enjoyed. The worship of Saturn was not so solemn or so universal as that of Jupiter. It was usual to offer human victims on his altars; but this barbarous custom was abolished by Hercules, who substituted small images of clay. In the sacrifices of Saturn, the priest always performed the ceremony with his head uncovered, which was unusual at other solemnities. The god is generally represented as an old man bent through age and infirmity. He holds a scythe in his right hand, with a serpent which bites its own tail, which is an emblem of time and of the revolution of the year. In his left hand he holds a child, which he raises up as if instantly to devour it. Tatius, king of the Sabines, first built a temple to Saturn on the Capitoline hill, a second was afterwards added by Tullus Hostilius, and a third by the first consuls. On his statues were generally hung fetters, in commemoration of the chains he had worn when imprisoned by Jupiter. From this circumstance all slaves that obtained their liberty generally dedicated their fetters to him. During the celebration of the Saturnalia, the chains were taken from the statues, to intimate the freedom and the independence which mankind enjoyed during the golden age. One of his temples at Rome was appropriated for the public treasury, and it was there also that the names of foreign ambassadors were enrolled. Hesiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.—*Virg. Satyri, demi-gods of the country, whose origin is unknown. They are represented like men, but with the feet and the legs of goats, short horns on the head, and the whole body covered with thick hair. They chiefly attended upon Bacchus, and rendered themselves known in his orgies by their riot and lasciviousness. The first fruits of every thing were generally offered to them. The Romans promiscuously called them Fauni Panes, and Sylvani. It is said that a Satyr was brought to Sylla, as that general returned from Thessaly. The monster had been surprised while asleep in a cave; but his voice was inarticulate when brought into the presence of the Roman general, and Sylla was so disgusted with it, that he ordered it to be instantly removed. The monster answered in every degree the description which the poets and painters have given of the Satyrs. Paus. 1, c. 23.—Plut. in Syll.—Virg. Ecl. 5, v. 13.—Ovid. Heroid. 4, v. 171.

Saurus, a famous robber of Elis, killed by Hercules. Paus. 6, c. 21.

Scamander, a son of Corybas and Demodice, who brought a colony from Crete into Phrygia, and settled at the foot of mount Ida, where he introduced the festivals of Cybele and the dances of the Corybantes. He, some time after, lost the use of his senses, and threw himself into the river Xanthus, which ever after bore his name. His son-in-law Teucer succeeded him in the government of the colony. He had two daughters, Thymo and Callirhoe. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Diod. 4. Vid. Part I.

Sciastes, a surname of Apollo at Lacedæmon, from the village Scias, where he was particularly worshipped. Lycoph. 562. Tzetzes. loco.

Scinis, a cruel robber, who tied men to the boughs of trees, which he had forcibly brought together, and which he afterwards unloosened so that their limbs were torn in an instant from their body. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 440.

Sciron, a celebrated thief in Attica, who plundered the inhabitants of the country, and threw them down from the highest rock into the sea, after he had obliged them to wait upon him and to wash his feet. Theseus attacked him, and treated him as he treated travellers. According to Ovid, the earth as well as the sea refused to receive the bones of Sciron, which remained for some time suspended in the air, till they were changed into large rocks called Scironia Saxa, situate between Megara and Corinth. There was a road near them which bore the name of Sciron, naturally small and narrow, but afterwards enlarged by the emperor Adrian. Some suppose that Ino threw herself into the sea from one of these rocks. Sciron had married the daughter of Cychreus a king of Salamis. He was brother-in-law to Telamon, the son of Æacus. Ovid. 7, Met. v. 444. Heroid. 2, v. 69.—Strab. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 13.—Plin. 2, c. 47.—Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 38.—Propert. 3, el. 14, v. 12.—Paus. 1, c. 44.—Senec. N. D. 5, c. 17.

Scylla, I, a daughter of Nisus, king of Megara, who became enamoured of Minos, as that monarch besieged her father's capital. To make him sensible of her passion, she informed him that she would deliver Megara into his hands if he promised to marry her. Minos consented, and as the prosperity of Megara depended on a golden hair which was on the head of Nisus, Scylla cut it off as her father was asleep, and from that moment the sallies of the Megarians were unsuccessful, and the enemy easily became masters of the place. Scylla was disappointed in her expectations, and Minos treated her with such contempt and ridicule, that she threw herself from a tower into the sea, or, according to other accounts, she was changed into a lark by the gods, and her father into a hawk. Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 393.—Paus. 2, c. 34.—Propert. 3, el. 19, v. 21.—Hygin, fab. 198.—Virg. G. 1, v. 405, &c.——II. A daughter of Typhon, or, as some say, of Phorcys, who was greatly loved by Glaucus, one of the deities of the sea. Scylla scorned the addresses of Glaucus, and the god, to render her more propitious, applied to Circe, whose knowledge of herbs and incantations was universally admired. Circe no sooner saw him than she became enamoured of him, and, instead of giving him the required assistance, she attempted to make him forget Scylla, but in vain. To punish her rival, Circe poured the juice of some poisonous herbs into the waters of the fountain where Scylla bathed, and no sooner had the nymph touched the place, than she found every part of her body below the waist, changed into frightful monsters, like dogs, which never ceased barking. The rest of her body assumed an equally hideous form. She found herself supported by twelve feet, and she had six different heads, each with three rows of teeth. This sudden metamorphosis so terrified her, that she threw herself into that part of the sea which separates the coast of Italy and Sicily, where she was changed into rocks, which continued to bear her name, and which were universally deemed by the ancients very dangerous to sailors. During a tempest the waves are described by modern navigators as roaring dreadfully when driven into the rough and uneven cavities of the rock. Homer. Od. 12, v. 85.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 66, &c.—Paus. 2, c. 34.—Hygin. fab. 199.——Some authors, as Propert. 4, el. 4, v. 39, and Virg. Ecl. 4, v. 74, with Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 500, have confounded the daughter of Typhon with the daughter of Nisus. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 424, &c.

Scythes, or Scythia, a son of Jupiter by a daughter of Tellus. Half his body was that of a man, and the rest that of a serpent. He became king of a country which he called Scythia. Diod. 2.

Segetia, a divinity at Rome, invoked by the husbandmen that the harvest might be plentiful. Aug. de Civ. D. 4, c. 8.—Macrob. 1, c. 16.—Paus. 18, c. 2.

Selinuus, a shepherd of Achaia, who, for some time, enjoyed the favours of the nymph Argyra without interruption. Argyra was at last disgusted with her lover, and the shepherd died through melancholy, and was changed into a river of the same name. Argyra was also changed into a fountain, and mingled her waters with those of the Selimnus. Paus. 7, c. 23.

Semele, a daughter of Cadmus by Hermione, the daughter of Mars and Venus. She was tenderly beloved by Jupiter, and after death was honoured with immortality under the name of Thyone. Some, however, suppose that she remained in the infernal regions till Bacchus, her son, was permitted to bring her back. Vid. Bacchus. There were in the temple of Diana, at Trœzene, two altars raised to the infernal gods, one of which was over an aperture through which, as Pausanias reports, Bacchus returned from hell with his mother. Semele was particularly worshipped at Brasiæ, in Laconia, where, according to a certain tradition, she had been driven by the winds with her son, after Cadmus had exposed her on the sea on account of her incontinent amour with Jupiter. The mother of Bacchus, though she received divine honours, had no temples; she had a statue in a temple of Ceres, at Thebes, in Bœotia. Paus. 3, c. 24, l. 9, c. 5.—Hesiod. Theog.—Homer. Il. 14, v. 323.—Orpheus. Hymn.—Eurip. in Bacch.—Apollod. 3, c. 4.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 264. Fast. 3, v. 715.—Diod. 3 and 4.

Semônes, inferior deities of Rome, not in the number of the great gods. Among these were Faunus, the Satyrs, Priapus, Vertumnus, Janus, Pan, Silenus, and all such illustrious heroes as had received divine honours after death. The word seems to be the same as semi homines, because they were inferior to the supreme gods, and superior to men. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 213.

Semosancus, one of the gods of the Romans, among the Indigetes, or such as were born and educated in their country.

Serapis, one of the Egyptian deities, supposed to be the same as Osiris. He had a magnificent temple at Memphis, another very rich at Alexandria, and a third at Canopus. The worship of Serapis was introduced at Rome by the emperor Antoninus Pius, A. D. 146, and the mysteries celebrated on the 6th of May, but with so much licentiousness that the senate were soon after obliged to abolish it. Herodotus, who speaks in a very circumstantial manner of the deities, and of the religion of the Egyptians, makes no mention of the god Serapis. Apollodorus says it is the same as the bull Apis. Paus. 1, c. 18, l. 2, c. 34.—Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 83.—Strab. 17.—Martial. 9, ep. 38. Though Serapis was a deity long known to the Egyptians, his worship was not formally introduced into Egypt until Ptolemy Soter caused his statue to be transported from Pontus, and placed in a magnificent temple erected by him to receive it in Alexandria. In his minute account of the Egyptian religion, &c., Herodotus makes no mention of Serapis, nor is he found in any of the remains of antiquity of unmixed Egyptian origin. He belongs, therefore, we may presume, to the Alexandrian era, and unites the Greek with the Egyptian mythology.

Sibyllæ, certain women inspired by heaven, who flourished in different parts of the world. Their number is unknown. Plato speaks of one, others of two, Pliny of three, Ælian of four, and Varro of ten, an opinion which is universally adopted by the learned. These ten Sibyls generally resided in the following places, Persia, Libya, Delphi, Cumæ in Italy, Erythræa, Samos, Cumæ in Æolia, Marpessa on the Hellespont, Ancyra in Phrygia, and Tiburtis. The most celebrated of the Sibyls is that of Cumæ in Italy, whom some have called by the different names of Amalthæa, Demophile, Herophile, Daphne, Manto, Phemonoe, and Deiphobe. It is said that Apollo became enamoured of her, and that, to make her sensible of his passion, he offered to give her whatever she should ask. The Sibyl demanded to live as many years as she had grains of sand in her hand, but unfortunately forgot to ask for the enjoyment of the health, vigour, and bloom of which she was then in possession. The god granted her her request, but she refused to gratify the passion of her lover, though he offered her perpetual youth and beauty. Some time after she became old and decrepit, her form decayed, melancholy, paleness and haggard looks succeeded to bloom and cheerfulness. She had already lived about seven hundred years when Æneas came to Italy; and, as some have imagined, she had three centuries more to live before her years were as numerous as the grains of sand which she had in her hand. She gave Æneas instructions how to find his father in the infernal regions, and even conducted him to the entrance of hell. It was usual in the Sibyl to write her prophecies on leaves, which she placed at the entrance of her cave, and it required particular care in such as consulted her to take up these leaves before they were dispersed by the wind, as their meaning then became incomprehensible. According to the most authentic historians of the Roman republic, one of the Sibyls came to the palace of Tarquin the Second, with nine volumes, which she offered to sell for a very high price. The monarch disregarded her, and she immediately disappeared, and soon after returned, when she had burned three of the volumes. She asked the same price for the remaining six books; and when Tarquin refused to buy them, she burned three more, and still persisted in demanding the same sum of money for the three that were left. This extraordinary behaviour astonished Tarquin; he bought the books, and the Sibyl instantly vanished, and never after appeared to the world. These books were preserved with great care by the monarch, and called the Sibylline verses. A college of priests was appointed to have the care of them; and such reverence did the Romans entertain for these prophetic books, that they were consulted with the greatest solemnity, and only when the state seemed to be in danger. When the capitol was burnt in the troubles of Sylla, the Sibylline verses, which were deposited there, perished in the conflagration; and to repair the loss which the republic seemed to have sustained, commissioners were immediately sent to different parts of Greece, to collect whatever verses could be found of the inspired writings of the Sibyls. The fate of these Sibylline verses, which were collected after the conflagration of the capitol, is unknown. There are now eight books of Sibylline verses extant, but they are universally reckoned spurious. They speak so plainly of our Saviour, of his sufferings, and of his death, as even to surpass far the sublime prediction of Isaiah in description; and therefore from this very circumstance it is evident that they were composed in the second century, by some of the followers of Christianity, who wished to convince the heathens of their error, by assisting the cause of truth with the arms of pious artifice. The word Sibyl seems to be derived from σιον Æolice for Διος Jovis, and βουλη consilium. Plut. in Phæd.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 35.—Paus. 10, c. 12, &c.—Diod. 4.—*Ovid. Sichæus. Vid. Part II.

Silenus, a demi-god, who became the nurse, the preceptor, and attendant of the god Bacchus. He was, as some suppose, son of Pan, or, according to others, of Mercury or of Terra. Malea in Lesbos was the place of his birth. After death he received divine honours, and had a temple in Elis. Silenus is generally represented as a fat and jolly old man, riding on an ass, crowned with flowers, and always intoxicated. He was once found by some peasants in Phrygia, after he had lost his way and could not follow Bacchus, and he was carried to King Midas, who received him with great attention. He detained him for ten days, and afterwards restored him to Bacchus, for which he was rewarded with the power of turning into gold whatever he touched. Some authors assert that Silenus was a philosopher, who accompanied Bacchus in his Indian expedition, and assisted him by the soundness of his counsels. From this circumstance, therefore, he is often introduced speaking with all the gravity of a philosopher concerning the formation of the world and the nature of things. The Fauns in general, and the Satyrs, are often called Sileni. Paus. 3, c. 25, l. 9, c. 24.—Philost. 23.—Ovid. Met. 4.—Hygin. fab. 191.—Diod. 3, &c.—Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 48.—Ælian. V. H. 3, c. 18.—Virg. Ecl. 6, v. 13.

Silvanus, a rural deity, son of an Italian shepherd. He is generally represented as half a man and half a goat. According to Virgil, he was son of Picus, or, as others report, of Mars, or according to Plutarch, of Valeria Tusculanaria. The worship of Silvanus was established only in Italy, where, as some authors have imagined, he reigned in the age of Evander. This deity was sometimes represented holding a cypress in his hand, on account of his regard for a beautiful youth, called Cyparissus, who was changed into a tree of the same name. Silvanus presided over gardens and limits, and he is often confounded with the Fauns, Satyrs, and Silenus. Plut. in Parall.—Virg. Ecl., 10. G. 1, v. 20, l. 2, v. 493.—Ælian. Anim. 6, c. 42. Ovid. Met. 10.—Horat. ep. 2.—Dionys. Hal. Vid. Part II.

Sinos, a nymph of Arcadia, who brought up Pan.

Simon. Vid. Part II.

Sinope, a daughter of the Asopus by Methone. She was beloved by Apollo, who carried her away to the borders of the Euxine Sea, in Asia Minor, where she gave birth to a son called Syrus. Diod. 4. Vid. Part I.

Sirenes, sea-nymphs who charmed so much with their melodious voice, that all forgot their employments to listen with more attention, and at last died for want of food. They were daughters of the Achelous, by the muse Calliope, or, according to others, by Melpomene or Terpsichore. They were three in number, called Parthenope, Ligeia, and Leucosia, or, according to others, Molpe, Aglaophonos, and Thelxiope or Thelxione, and they usually lived in a small island near cape Pelorus in Sicily. According to Ovid, they were so disconsolate at the rape of Proserpine, that they prayed the gods to give them wings that they might seek her in the sea as well as by land. The Sirens were informed by the oracle, that as soon as any persons passed by them without suffering themselves to be charmed by their songs, they should perish; and their melody had prevailed in calling the attention of all passengers, till Ulysses, informed of the power of their voice by Circe, stopped the ears of his companions with wax, and ordered himself to be tied to the mast of his ship, and no attention to be paid to his commands should he wish to stay and listen to the song. Upon this artifice of Ulysses, the Sirens were so disappointed that they threw themselves into the sea and perished. Some authors say that the Sirens challenged the Muses to a trial of skill in singing, and that the latter proved victorious, and plucked the feathers from the wings of their adversaries, with which they made themselves crowns. The place where the Sirens destroyed themselves was afterwards called Sirenis, on the coast of Sicily. Virgil, however, Æn. 6, v. 864, places the Sirenum Scopuli on the coast of Italy, near the island of Caprea. The Sirens are often represented holding, one a lyre, a second a flute, and the third singing. Paus. 10, c. 6.—Homer. Od. 12, v. 167.—Strab. 6.—Ammian. 29, c. 2.—Hygin. fab. 141.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 555, de Art. Am. 3, v. 311.—Ital. 12, v. 33.

Sisyphus, a brother of Athamas and Salmoneus, son of Æolus and Enaretta, the most crafty prince of the heroic ages. He married Merope, the daughter of Atlas, or, according to others, of Pandareus, by whom he had several children. He built Ephyre, called afterwards Corinth. It is reported that Sisyphus, mistrusting Autolycus, who stole the neighbouring flocks, marked his bulls under the feet, and when they had been carried away by the dishonesty of his friend, he confounded and astonished the thief by selecting from his numerous flocks those bulls, which by the mark he knew to be his own. After his death, Sisyphus was condemned in hell, to roll to the top of a hill a large stone, which had no sooner reached the summit than it fell back into the plain with impetuosity, and rendered his punishment eternal. The causes of this rigorous sentence are variously reported. Some attribute it to his continual depredations in the neighbouring country, and his cruelty in laying heaps of stones on those whom he had plundered, and suffering them to expire in the most agonizing torments. Others, to the insult offered to Pluto, in chaining death in his palace, and detaining her till Mars, at the request of the king of hell, went to deliver her from confinement. Others suppose that Jupiter inflicted this punishment because he told Asopus where his daughter Ægina had been carried away by her ravisher. The more followed opinion however is, that Sisyphus, on his death-bed, entreated his wife to leave his body unburied; and when he came into Pluto's kingdom, he received the permission of returning upon earth to punish this seeming negligence of his wife, but, however, on promise of immediately returning. But he was no sooner out of the infernal regions, than he violated his engagements; and when he was at last brought back to hell by Mars, Pluto, to punish his want of fidelity, condemned him to roll a huge stone to the top of a mountain. The institution of the Pythian games is attributed by some to Sisyphus. To be of the blood of Sisyphus was deemed disgraceful among the ancients. Homer. Od. 11, v. 592.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 616.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 459, l. 13, v. 32. Fast. 4, v. 175, in Ibid. 191.—Paus. 2, &c.—Horat. 2, od. 14, v. 20. Vid. Part II.

Smilax. Vid. Crocus.

Smintheus, one of the surnames of Apollo in Phrygia, where the inhabitants raised him a temple because he had destroyed a number of rats that infested the country. These rats were called σμινθαι, in the language of Phrygia, whence the surname. There is another story similar to this related by the Greek scholiast of Homer. Il. 1, v. 39.—Strab. 13.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 585.

Sol, (the sun,) was an object of veneration among the ancients. It was particularly worshipped by the Persians, under the name of Mithras; and was the Baal or Bel of the Chaldeans, the Belphegor of the Moabites, the Moloch of the Canaanites, the Osiris of the Egyptians, and the Adonis of the Syrians. The Massagetæ sacrificed horses to the sun on account of their swiftness. According to some of the ancient poets, Sol and Apollo were two different persons. Apollo, however, and Phœbus and Sol, are universally supposed to be the same deity.

Somnus, son of Erebus and Nox, was one of the infernal deities, and presided over sleep. His palace, according to some mythologists, is a dark cave where the sun never penetrates. At the entrance are a number of poppies and somniferous herbs. The god himself is represented as asleep on a bed of feathers with black curtains. The dreams stand by him, and Morpheus, as his principal minister, watches to prevent the noise from awaking him. The Lacedæmonians always placed the image of Somnus near that of death. Hesiod. Theog.—Hom. Il. 14.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 893.—Ovid. Met. 11.

Sophax, a son of Hercules and Tinga, the widow of Antæus, who founded the kingdom of Tingis, in Mauretania, and from whom were descended Diodorus, and Juba, king of Mauretania. Strab. 3.

Sorge, a daughter of Œneus, king of Calydon, by Æthea, daughter of Thestius. She married Andremon, and was mother of Oxilus. Apollod. 1 and 2.

Sospita, a surname of Juno in Latium. Her most famous temple was at Lanuvium. She had also two at Rome, and her statue was covered with a goat-skin, with a buckle, &c. Liv. 3, 6, 8, &c.—Festus. de V. sig.

Sothis, an Egyptian name of the constellation called Sirius, which received divine honours in that country.

Spartæ, or Sparti, a name given to those men who sprang from the dragon's teeth which Cadmus sowed. They all destroyed one another, except five, who survived, and assisted Cadmus in building Thebes.

Spherus, an arm-bearer of Pelops, son of Tantalus. He was buried in a small island near the isthmus of Corinth, which from him was called Spheria. Paus. 5, c. 10.

Sphinx, a monster which had the head and breasts of a woman, the body of a dog, the tail of a serpent, the wings of a bird, the paws of a lion, and a human voice. It sprang from the union of Orthos with the Chimæra, or of Typhon with Echidna. The Sphinx had been sent into the neighbourhood of Thebes by Juno, who wished to punish the family of Cadmus, which she persecuted with immortal hatred, and it laid this part of Bœotia under continual alarms by proposing enigmas, and devouring the inhabitants if unable to explain them. In the midst of their consternation the Thebans were told by the oracle, that the Sphinx would destroy herself as soon as one of the enigmas she proposed was explained. In this enigma she wished to know what animal walked on four legs in the morning, two at noon, and three in the evening. Upon this Creon, king of Thebes, promised his crown, and his sister Jocasta in marriage, to him who could deliver his country from the monster by a successful explanation of the enigma. It was at last happily explained by Œdipus, who observed that man walked on his hands and feet when young or in the morning of life, at the noon of life he walked erect, and in the evening of his days he supported his infirmities upon a stick. Vid. Œdipus. The Sphinx no sooner heard this explanation than she dashed her head against a rock, and immediately expired. Some mythologists wish to unriddle the fabulous traditions about the Sphinx, by the supposition that one of the daughters of Cadmus, or Laius, infested the country of Thebes by her continual depredations, because she had been refused a part of her father's possessions. The lion's paw expressed, as they observed, her cruelty, the body of the dog her lasciviousness, her enigmas the snares she laid for strangers and travellers, and her wings the despatch she used in her expeditions. Plut.—*Hesiod. Stator, a surname of Jupiter, given him by Romulus, because he stopped (sto) the flight of the Romans in a battle against the Sabines. The conqueror erected him a temple under that name. Liv. 1, c. 12.

Stellio, a youth turned into an elf by Ceres, because he derided the goddess, who drank with avidity when tired and afflicted in her vain pursuit of her daughter Proserpine. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 445.

Stenobœa, or Sthenobœa. Vid. Bellerophon.

Stentor, one of the Greeks who went to the Trojan war. His voice alone was louder than that of 50 men together. Homer Il. 5, v. 784.—Juv. 13, v. 112.

Steröpe, I. one of the Pleiades, daughters of Atlas. She married Œnomaus, king of Pisæ, by whom she had Hippodamia, &c.——II. A daughter of Parthaon, supposed by some to be the mother of the Sirens.

Sthenelus, I. a king of Mycenæ, son of Perseus and Andromeda. He married Nicippe, the daughter of Pelops, by whom he had two daughters, and a son called Eurystheus. Sthenelus made war against Amphitryon, who had killed Electryon and seized his kingdom. He fought with success, and took his enemy prisoner, whom he transmitted to Eurystheus. Homer. Il. 19, v. 91.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.——II. A son of Capaneus. He was one of the Epigoni, and of the suiters of Helen. He went to the Trojan war, and was one of those who were shut up in the wooden horse, according to Virgil. Paus. 2, c. 18.—Virg. Æn. 2 and 10.——III. A son of Androgeus, the son of Minos. Hercules made him king of Thrace. Apollod. 2, c. 5.——IV. A king of Argos, who succeeded his father Crotopus. Paus. 2, c. 16.——V. A son of Actor, who accompanied Hercules in his expedition against the Amazons. He was killed by one of these females.——VI. A son of Melas, killed by Tydeus. Apollod. 1, c. 8.

Stilbe, or Stilbia, a daughter of Penneus, by Creusa, who became mother of Centaurus and Lapithus, by Apollo. Diod. 4.

Strenua, a goddess at Rome, who gave vigour and energy to the weak and indolent. Aug. de Civ. D. 4, c. 11 and 16.

Strophius. Vid. Part I.

Stymphalus, a king of Arcadia, son of Elatus and Laodice. He made war against Pelops, and was killed in a truce. Apollod. 3, c. 9.—Paus. 8, c. 4. Vid. Part I.

Styrus, a king of Albania, to whom Æetes promised his daughter Medea in marriage, to obtain his assistance against the Argonauts. Flacc. 3, v. 497, l. 8, v. 358.

Styx, I. a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. She married Pallas, by whom she had three daughters, Victory, Strength, and Valour. Hesiod. Theog. 363 and 384.—Apollod. 1, c. 2.——II. A celebrated river of hell, round which it flows nine times. According to some writers, the Styx was a small river of Nonacris, in Arcadia, whose waters were so cold and venomous that they proved fatal to those who tasted them. Among others, Alexander the Great is mentioned as a victim to their fatal poison, in consequence of drinking them. They even consumed iron, and broke all vessels. The wonderful properties of this water suggested the idea that it was a river of hell, especially when it disappeared in the earth a little below its fountain head. The gods held the waters of the Styx in such veneration that they always swore by them; an oath which was inviolable. If any of the gods had perjured themselves, Jupiter obliged them to drink the waters of the Styx, which lulled them for one whole year into a senseless stupidity; for the nine following years they were deprived of the ambrosia and the nectar of the gods, and after the expiration of the years of their punishment, they were restored to the assembly of the deities, and to all their original privileges. It is said that this veneration was shown to the Styx, because it received its name from the nymph Styx, who with her three daughters assisted Jupiter in his war against the Titans. Hesiod. Theog. v. 384, 775.—Homer. Od. 10, v. 513.—Herodot. 6, c. 74.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 323, 439, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—*Ovid. Suada, the goddess of persuasion, called Pitho by the Greeks. She had a form of worship established to her honour first by Theseus. She had a statue in the temple of Venus Praxis at Megara. Cic. de el. Orat. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 22 and 43, l. 9, c. 35.

Summanus, a surname of Pluto, as prince of the dead, summus manium. He had a temple at Rome, erected during the wars with Pyrrhus, and the Romans believed that the thunderbolts of Jupiter were in his power during the night. Cic. de Div.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 731.

Sylvia. Vid. Rhea.

Sylvius. Vid. Part II.

Syrinx, a nymph of Arcadia, daughter of the river Ladon. Pan became enamoured of her, but Syrinx escaped, and at her own request was changed by the gods into a reed called Syrinx by the Greeks. The god made himself a pipe with the reeds into which his favourite nymph had been changed. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 691.—Martial. 9, ep. 63.

T.

Tages, a son of Genius, grandson of Jupiter, was the first who taught the 12 nations of the Etrurians the science of augury and divination. It is said that he was found by a Tuscan ploughman in the form of a clod, and that he assumed a human shape to instruct this nation, which became so celebrated for their knowledge of omens and incantations. Cic. de Div. 2, c. 23.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 558.—Lucan. 1, v. 673.

Talaus, a son of Bias and Pero, father of Adrastus by Lysimache. He was one of the Argonauts. Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 6.

Talus, a youth, son of the sister of Dædalus, who invented the saw, compasses, and other mechanical instruments. His uncle became jealous of his growing fame, and murdered him privately; or, according to others, he threw him down from the citadel of Athens. Talus was changed into a partridge by the gods. He is also called Calus, Acalus, Perdix, and Taliris. Apollod. 3, c. 1.—Paus. 1, c. 21.—Ovid. Met. 8.

Tantălides, I. a patronymic applied to the descendants of Tantalus, such as Niobe, Hermione, &c.——II. Agamemnon and Menelaus, as grandsons of Tantalus, are called Tantalidæ fratres. Ovid. Heroid. 8, v. 45 and 122.

Tantălus, a king of Lydia, son of Jupiter, by a nymph called Pluto. He was father of Niobe, Pelops, &c., by Dione, one of the Atlantides, called by some Euryanassa. Tantalus is represented by the poets as punished in hell with an insatiable thirst, and placed up to the chin in the midst of a pool of water, which, however, flows away as soon as he attempts to taste it. There hangs also above his head, a bough, richly loaded with delicious fruits; which, as soon as he attempts to seize, is carried away from his reach by a sudden blast of wind. According to some mythologists, his punishment is to sit under a huge stone, hung at some distance over his head, and as it seems every moment ready to fall, he is kept under continual alarms and never-ceasing fears. The causes of this eternal punishment are variously explained. Some declare that it was inflicted upon him because he stole a favourite dog, which Jupiter had intrusted to his care to keep his temple in Crete. Others say that he stole away the nectar and ambrosia from the tables of the gods, when he was admitted into the assemblies of heaven, and that he gave it to mortals on earth. Others support that this proceeds from his cruelty and impiety in killing his son Pelops, and in serving his limbs as food before the gods, whose divinity and power he wished to try, when they had stopped at his house as they passed over Phrygia. There were also others who impute it to his carrying away Ganymedes. Pindar. Olymp. 1.—Homer. Od. 11, v. 581.—*Cic. Taranis, a name of Jupiter among the Gauls, to whom human sacrifices were offered. Lucan. 1, v. 446.

Taraxippus, a deity worshipped at Elis. His statue was placed near the race-ground, and his protection was implored that no harm might happen to the horses during the games. Paus. 6, c. 20, &c.—Dionys. Hal. 2.

Tartărus, (pl. a, orum,) one of the regions of hell, where, according to the ancients, the most impious and guilty among mankind were punished. It was surrounded with a brazen wall, and its entrance was continually hidden from the sight by a cloud of darkness, which is represented three times more gloomy than the obscurest night. According to Hesiod, it was a separate prison, at a greater distance from the earth, than the earth is from the heavens. Virgil says that it was surrounded by three impenetrable walls, and by the impetuous and burning streams of the river Phlegethon. The entrance is by a large and lofty tower, whose gates are supported by columns of adamant, which neither gods nor men can open. It was the place where Ixion, Tityus, the Danaides, Tantalus, Sisyphus, &c. were punished, according to Ovid. Hesiod. Theog. v. 720.—Sil. 13, v. 591.—Virg. Æn. 6.—Homer. Od. 11.—Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 13.

Taurica, a surname of Diana, because she was worshipped by the inhabitants of Taurica Chersonesus.

Taurus, an officer of Minos, king of Crete. Vid. Minotaurus. He was vanquished by Theseus in the games which Minos exhibited in Crete. Plut. in Thes.

Teutămus, son of Dorus, grandson of Hellen, the son of Deucalion, went to Crete with the Ætolians and Pelasgians, and reigned there. He had a son called Asterius, by the daughter of Cretheus.

TĔLĂMON. Vid. Part II.

TELCHĪNIA, a surname of Minerva at Teumessa in Bœotia, where she had a temple. Paus. 9, c. 19.——Also a surname of Juno in Rhodes, where she had a statue at Ialysus, raised by the Telchinians, who settled there.——Also an ancient name of Crete, as the place from whence the Telchines of Rhodes were descended. Stat. 6, Sylv. 6, v. 47.

TELCHĪNIUS, a surname of Apollo among the Rhodians. Diod. 5.

TELCHIS, a son of Europs, the son of Ægialeus. He was one of the first kings of the Peloponnesus.

TĔLĔGŌNUS, a king of Egypt, who married Io after she had been restored to her original form by Jupiter. Apollod. Vid. Part II.

TELĔMĂCHUS. Vid. Part II.

TELĔMUS, a Cyclops, who was acquainted with futurity. He foretold to Polyphemus all the evils which he some time after suffered from Ulysses. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 771.

TELEPHASSA, the mother of Cadmus, Phœnix, and Clix, by Agenor. She died in Thrace, as she was seeking her daughter Europa, whom Jupiter had carried away. Apollod. 3, c. 1 and 4.

TĔLĔPHUS, a king of Mysia, son of Hercules and Auge, the daughter of Aleus. He was exposed as soon as born on mount Parthenius, but his life was preserved by a goat, and by some shepherds. According to Apollodorus, he was exposed, not on a mountain, but in the temple of Minerva, at Tegea, or, according to a tradition mentioned by Pausanias, he was left to the mercy of the waves with his mother, by the cruelty of Aleus, and carried by the winds to the mouth of the Caycus, where he was found by Teuthras, king of the country, who married, or rather adopted as his daughter, Auge, and educated her son. Some, however, suppose, that Auge fled to Teuthras to avoid the anger of her father on account of her amour with Hercules. Yet others declare that Aleus gave her to Nauplius to be severely punished for her incontinence; and that Nauplius, unwilling to injure her, sent her to Teuthras, king of Bithynia, by whom she was adopted. Telephus, according to the more received opinions, was ignorant of his origin, and he was ordered by the oracle, if he wished to know his parents, to go to Mysia. Obedient to this injunction, he came to Mysia, where Teuthras offered him his crown and his adopted daughter Auge in marriage, if he would deliver his country from the hostilities of Idas, the son of Apharous. Telephus readily complied, and at the head of the Mysians he soon routed the enemy and received the promised reward. As he was going to unite himself to Auge, the sudden appearance of an enormous serpent separated the two lovers; Auge implored the assistance of Hercules, and was soon informed by the god that Telephus was her own son. When this was known, the nuptials were not celebrated, and Telephus, some time after, married one of the daughters of King Priam. As one of the sons of the Trojan monarch, Telephus prepared to assist Priam against the Greeks, and with heroic valour he attacked them when they had landed on his coast. The carnage was great and Telephus was victorious, when Bacchus, who protected the Greeks, suddenly raised a vine from the earth, which entangled the feet of the monarch, and laid him flat on the ground. Achilles immediately rushed upon him, and wounded him so severely that he was carried away from the battle. The wound was mortal, and Telephus was informed by the oracle, that he alone who had inflicted it could totally cure it. Upon this, applications were made to Achilles, but in vain; the hero observed that he was no physician, till Ulysses, who knew that Troy could not be taken without the assistance of one of the sons of Hercules, and who wished to make Telephus the friend of the Greeks, persuaded Achilles to obey the directions of the oracle. Achilles consented, and as the weapon which had given the wound could alone cure it, the hero scraped the rust from the point of his spear, and by applying it to the sore, gave it immediate relief. It is said that Telephus showed himself so grateful to the Greeks that he accompanied them to the Trojan war, and fought with them against his father-in-law. Hygin. fab. 101.—Paus. 8, c. 48.—Apollod. 2, c. 7, &c.—*Ælian. TELETHŪSA. Vid. Iphis.

TELEUTE, a surname of Venus among the Egyptians. Plut. de Is. & Os.

TELLUS, a divinity, the same as the Earth, the most ancient of all the gods after Chaos. She was mother by Cœlus of Oceanus, Hyperion, Ceus, Rhea, Japetus, Themis, Saturn, Phœbe, Tethys, &c. Tellus is the same as the divinity who is honoured under the several names of Cybele, Rhea, Vesta, Ceres, Tithea, Bona Dea, Proserpine, &c. She was generally represented in the character of Tellus, as a woman with many breasts, distended with milk, to express the fecundity of the earth. She also appeared crowned with turrets, holding a sceptre in one hand and a key in the other, while at her feet was lying a tame lion without chains, as if to intimate that every part of the earth can be made fruitful by means of cultivation.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 130.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 137.—Apollod. 1, c. 1. Vid. Part II.

TELPHŪSA, a nymph of Arcadia, daughter of the Ladon, who gave her name to a town and fountain of that place. The waters of the fountain Telphusa were so cold, that Tiresias died by drinking them. Diod. 4.—Strab. 9.—Lycophron. 1040. Vid. Part II.

TEMĔNITES, a surname of Apollo, which he received at Temenos, a small place near Syracuse, where he was worshipped. Cic. in Verr.

TENES. Vid. Part II.

TEREUS, a king of Thrace, son of Mars and Bistonis. He married Progne, the daughter of Pandion, king of Athens, whom he had assisted in a war against Megara. Vid. Philomela.

TERMĔRUS, a robber of Peloponnesus, who killed people by crushing their heads against his own. He was slain by Hercules in the same manner. Plut. in Thes.

TERMINĀLIA, a surname of Jupiter, because he presided over the boundaries and lands of individuals, before the worship of the god Terminus was introduced. Dionys. Hal. 2.

TERMĪNUS, a divinity at Rome, who was supposed to preside over bounds and limits, and to punish all unlawful usurpation of land. His worship was at first introduced at Rome by Numa, who persuaded his subjects that the limits of their lands and estates were under the immediate inspection of heaven. His temple was on the Tarpeian rock, and he was represented with a human head without feet or arms to intimate that he never moved, wherever he was placed. The people of the country assembled once a year with their families, and crowned with garlands and flowers the stones which separated their different possessions, and offered victims to the god who presided over their boundaries. It is said that when Tarquin the Proud wished to build a temple on the Tarpeian rock to Jupiter, the god Terminus refused to give way, though the other gods resigned their seats with cheerfulness; whence Ovid has said:—

Restitit, et magno cum Jove templa tenet.

Dionys. Hal. 2.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 641.—Plut. in Num.—Liv. 5.—Virg. Æn. 9.

Terpsichore, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over dancing, of which she was reckoned the inventress, as her name intimates, and with which she delighted her sisters. She is represented like a young virgin crowned with laurel, and holding in her hand a musical instrument. Juv. 7, v. 35.—Apollod. 1.—Eustat. in Il. 10.

Terra, one of the most ancient deities in mythology, wife of Uranus, and mother of Oceanus, the Titans, Cyclops, Giants, Thea, Rhea, Themis, Phœbe, Thetys, and Mnemosyne. By the Air she had Grief, Mourning, Oblivion, Vengeance, &c. According to Hyginus, she is the same as Tellus. Vid. Tellus.

Terror, an emotion of the mind, which the ancients have made a deity, and one of the attendants of the god Mars, and of Bellona.

Tethys, the greatest of the sea-deities, was wife of Oceanus, and daughter of Uranus and Terra. She was mother of the chiefest rivers of the universe, such as the Nile, the Alpheus, the Mæander, Simois, Peneus, Evenus, Scamander, &c., and about 3000 daughters, called Oceanides. Tethys is confounded by some mythologists with her grand-daughter Thetis, the wife of Peleus and the mother of Achilles. The word Tethys is poetically used to express the sea. Apollod. 1, c. 1, &c.—Virg. G. 1, v. 31.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 509, l. 9, v. 498.—Fast. 2, v. 191.—Hesiod. Theogn. v. 336.—Homer. Il. 14, v. 302.

Teucer. Vid. Part II.

Teutas, or Teutates, a name of Mercury among the Gauls. The people offered human victims to this deity. Lucan. 1, v. 445.—Cæsar. Bell. G.

Teuthras, a king of Mysia, on the borders of the Caycus. Vid. Telephus. The 50 daughters of Teuthras, who became mothers by Hercules, are called Teuthrantia turba. Apollod. 2, c. 7, &c.—Paus. 3, c. 25.—Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 19. Heroid. 9, v. 51.—Hygin. fab. 100.

Thalassius, a beautiful young Roman, in the reign of Romulus. At the rape of the Sabines, one of these virgins appeared remarkable for beauty and elegance, and her ravisher, afraid of many competitors, exclaimed as he carried her away, that it was for Thalassius. The name of Thalassius was no sooner mentioned, than all were eager to preserve so beautiful a prize for him. Their union was attended with so much happiness, that it was ever after usual at Rome to make use of the word Thalassius at nuptials, and to wish those that were married the felicity of Thalassius. He is supposed by some to be the same as Hymen, as he was made a deity. Plut. in Rom.—Martial. 3, ep. 92.—Liv. 1, c. 9.

Thalestria, or Thalestris, a queen of the Amazons, who, accompanied by 300 women, came 35 days' journey to meet Alexander in his Asiatic conquests, to raise children by a man whose fame was so great and courage so uncommon. Curt. 6, c. 5.—Strab. 11.—Justin. 2, c. 4.

Thalia, one of the Muses, who presided over festivals, and over pastoral and comic poetry. She is represented leaning on a column, holding a mask in her right hand, by which she is distinguished from her sisters, as also by a shepherd's crook. Her dress appears shorter, and not so ornamented as that of the other Muses. Horat. 4, Od. 6, v. 25.—Mart. 9, ep. 75.—Plut. in Symp. &c.—Virg. Ec. 6, v. 2. Vid. Charites.

Thamyras, or Thamyris, a celebrated musician of Thrace. His father's name was Philammon, and his mother's Agriope. He became enamoured of the Muses, and challenged them to a trial of skill. His challenge was accepted, and it was mutually agreed that the conquered should be totally at the disposal of his victorious adversary. He was conquered, and the Muses deprived him of his eyesight, and of his melodious voice, and broke his lyre. His poetical compositions are lost. Some accused him of having first introduced into the world the unnatural vice of which Socrates is accused. Homer. Il. 2, v. 594, l. 5, v. 599.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Ovid. Amor. 3, el. 7, v. 62, Art. Am. 3, 399.—Paus. 4, c. 33.

Tharops, the father of Œager, to whom Bacchus gave the kingdom of Thrace, after the death of Lycurgus. Diod. 4.

Thasus, a son of Neptune, who went with Cadmus to seek Europa. He built the town of Thasus in Thrace. Some make him brother of Cadmus. Apollod. 3, c. 1.

Thaumantias, and Thaumantis, a name given to Iris, the messenger of Juno, because she was the daughter of Thaumas, the son of Oceanus and Terra, by one of the Ocea ides. Hesiod. Theog.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 5.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 479, l. 14, v. 845.

Thaumas, a son of Neptune and Terra, who married Electra, one of the Oceanides, by whom he had Iris and the Harpies, &c. Apollod. 1, c. 2.

Thea, a daughter of Uranus and Terra. She married her brother Hyperion, by whom she had the sun, the moon, Aurora, &c. She is also called Thia, Titæa, Rhea, Tethys, &c.

Theano. Vid. Part II.

Themis, I. a daughter of Cœlus and Terra, who married Jupiter against her own inclination. She became mother of Dice, Irene, Eunomia, the Parcæ and Horæ; and was the first to whom the inhabitants of the earth raised temples. Her oracle was famous in Attica in the age of Deucalion, who consulted it with great solemnity, and was instructed how to repair the loss of mankind. She was generally attended by the Seasons. Among the moderns she is represented as holding a sword in one hand and a pair of scales in the other. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 321.——II. A daughter of Ilus, who married Capys, and became mother of Anchises. Apollod. 3, c. 12.

THEMISTO, daughter of Hypseus, was the third wife of Athamas, king of Thebes, by whom she had four sons, called Ptous, Leucon, Schœneus, and Erythroes. She endeavoured to kill the children of Ino, her husband's second wife, but she killed her own by means of Ino, who lived in her house in the disguise of a servant-maid, and to whom she intrusted her bloody intentions, upon which she destroyed herself. Paus. 9, c. 23.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.

THEOCLYMENUS, a soothsayer of Argolis, descended from Melampus. His father's name was Thestor. He foretold the speedy return of Ulysses to Penelope and Telemachus. Homer. Od. 15, v. 225, &c.—Hygin. fab. 128.

THEODĂMAS, or THIODAMAS, a king of Mysia, in Asia Minor. He was killed by Hercules, because he refused to treat him and his son Hyllus with hospitality. Ovid. in Ib. v. 438.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Hygin. fab. 271.

THEONOE, I. a daughter of Thestor, sister to Calchas. She was carried away by sea pirates, and sold to Icarus, king of Caria, &c. Hygin. fab. 190.——II. A daughter of Proteus and a Nereid, who became enamoured of Canobus, the pilot of a Trojan vessel, &c.

THEOPHĂNE, a daughter of Bisaltus, whom Neptune changed into a sheep, to remove her from her numerous suiters, and conveyed to the island Crumissa. Of her was born the ram with the golden fleece, which carried Phryxus to Colchis. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 177.—Hygin. fab. 188.

THEORIUS, a surname of Apollo at Trœzene, where he had a very ancient temple. It signifies clear-sighted.

THERITAS, a surname of Mars in Laconia.

THĔRSANDER. Vid. Part II.

THERSITES. Vid. Part II.

THESEUS, king of Athens, and son of Ægeus, by Æthra the daughter of Pittheus, was one of the most celebrated of the heroes of antiquity. He was educated at Trœzene, in the house of Pittheus, and as he was not publicly acknowledged to be the son of the king of Athens, he passed for the son of Neptune. When he came to years of maturity, he was sent by his mother to his father, and a sword was given him by which he might make himself known to Ægeus in a private manner. Vid. Ægeus. The road from Trœzene to Athens was infested with robbers and wild beasts, and rendered impassable; but these obstacles were easily removed by the courageous son of Ægeus. He destroyed Corynetes, Synnis, Sciron, Cercyon, Procrustes, and the celebrated Phæa At Athens, however, his reception was not cordial; Medea lived there with Ægeus, and as she knew that her influence would fall to the ground if Theseus were received by his father's house, she attempted to destroy him before his arrival was made public. Ægeus was himself to give the cup of poison to this unknown stranger at a feast, but the sight of his sword on the side of Theseus, reminded him of his amours with Æthra. He knew him to be his son, and the people of Athens were glad to find that this illustrious stranger, who had cleared Attica from robbers and pirates, was the son of their monarch. The Pallantides were all put to death by the young prince. The bull of Marathon next engaged the attention of Theseus. After this, Theseus went to Crete among the seven chosen youths whom the Athenians yearly sent to be devoured by the Minotaur. The wish to deliver his country from so dreadful a tribute engaged him to undertake his expedition. He was successful by means of Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, who was enamoured of him; and after he had escaped from the labyrinth with a clew of thread, and killed the Minotaur, (Vid. Minotaurus,) he sailed from Crete with the six boys and seven maidens whom his victory had equally redeemed from death. In the island of Naxos, where he was driven by the winds, he had the meanness to abandon Ariadne, to whom he was indebted for his safety. The rejoicings which his return might have occasioned at Athens were interrupted by the death of Ægeus, who threw himself into the sea when he saw his son's ship return with black sails, which was the signal of ill success. Vid. Ægeus. His accession to his father's throne was universally applauded, B. C. 1235. The Athenians were governed with mildness, and Theseus made new regulations and enacted new laws. The number of the inhabitants of Athens was increased by the liberality of the monarch, religious worship was attended with more than usual solemnity, a court was instituted which had the care of all civil affairs, and Theseus made the government democratical, while he reserved for himself only the command of the armies. The fame which he had gained by his victories and policy made his alliance courted; but Pirithous, king of the Lapithæ, alone wished to gain his friendship by meeting him in the field of battle. He invaded the territories of Attica; and when Theseus had marched out to meet him, the two enemies, struck at the sight of each other, rushed between their two armies, to embrace one another in the most cordial and affectionate manner, and from that time began the most sincere and admired friendship, which has become proverbial. Theseus was present at the nuptials of his friend, and was the most eager and courageous of the Lapithæ in the defence of Hippodamia, and her female attendants, against the brutal attempts of the Centaurs. When Pirithous had lost Hippodamia, he agreed with Theseus, whose wife Phædra was also dead, to carry away some of the daughters of the gods. Their first attempt was upon Helen, the daughter of Leda, and after they had obtained this beautiful prize, they cast lots, and she became the property of Theseus. The Athenian monarch intrusted her to the care of his mother Æthra, at Aphidnæ, till she was of nubile years; but the resentment of Castor and Pollux soon obliged him to restore her safe into their hands. Helen was but nine years old when carried away by the two royal friends, and Ovid introduces her in one of his epistles, saying, Excepto redii passa timore nihil. Some time after, Theseus assisted his friend in procuring a wife, and they both descended into the infernal regions to carry away Proserpine. Pluto, apprized of their intentions, stopped them. Pirithous was placed on his father's wheel, and Theseus was tied to a huge stone, on which he had sat to rest himself. Virgil represents him in this eternal state of punishment, repeating to the shades in Tartarus the words of Discite justitiam moniti, et non temnere divos. Apollodorus, however, and others declare, that he was not long detained in hell; when Hercules came to steal the dog Cerberus, he tore him away from the stone, but with such violence that his skin was left behind. The same assistance was given to Pirithous; and the two friends returned upon the earth by the favour of Hercules, and the consent of the infernal deities, not, however, without suffering the most excruciating torments. During the captivity of Theseus in the kingdom of Pluto, Mnestheus, one of the descendants of Erechtheus, ingratiated himself into the favour of the people of Athens, and obtained the crown in preference to the children of the absent monarch. At his return, Theseus attempted to eject the usurper, but to no purpose. The Athenians had forgotten his many services, and he retired with great mortification to the court of Lycomedes, king of the island of Scyros. After paying him much attention, Lycomedes, either jealous of his fame or bribed by the presents of Mnestheus, carried him to a high rock, on pretence of showing him the extent of his dominions, and threw him down a deep precipice. Some suppose that Theseus inadvertently fell down this precipice, and that he was crushed to death without receiving any violence from Lycomedes. The children of Theseus, after the death of Mnestheus, recovered the Athenian throne; and that the memory of their father might not be without the honours due to a hero, they brought his remains from Scyros, and gave them a magnificent burial. They also raised him statues and a temple, and festivals and games were publicly instituted to commemorate the actions of a hero who had rendered such services to the people of Athens. These festivals were still celebrated in the age of Pausanias and Plutarch, about 1200 years after the death of Theseus. The historians disagree from the poets in their accounts about this hero, and they all suppose, that, instead of attempting to carry away the wife of Pluto, the two friends wished to seduce a daughter of Aidoneus, king of the Molossi. This daughter, as they say, bore the name of Proserpine, and the dog which kept the gates of the palace was called Cerberus; and hence perhaps arises the fiction of the poets. Pirithous was torn to pieces by the dog, but Theseus was confined in prison, from whence he made his escape, some time after, by the assistance of Hercules. Some authors place Theseus and his friend in the number of the Argonauts, but they were both detained, either in the infernal regions, or in the country of the Molossi, in the time of Jason's expedition to Colchis. Plut. in vitâ.—Apollod. 3.—Hygin. fab. 14 and 79.—Paus. 1, c. 2, &c.—*Ovid. Thespiades, a surname of the nine Muses, because they were held in great veneration in Thespia.

Thespis, a Greek poet of Attica, supposed by some to be the inventor of tragedy, 536 years before Christ. His representations were very rustic and imperfect. He went from town to town upon a cart, on which was erected a temporary stage, where two actors, whose faces were daubed with the lees of wine, entertained the audience with choral songs, &c. Solon was a great enemy to his dramatic representations. Horat. Art. P. 276.—Diod.

Thespius, a king of Thespia, in Bœotia, son of Erechtheus, according to some authors. He was desirous that his fifty daughters should have children by Hercules, and therefore when that hero was at his court he permitted him to enjoy their company. This passes for the 13th and most arduous of the labours of Hercules, as the two following lines from the arcana arcanissima indicate:—

Quinquaginta simul stupravit nocte puellas.

All the daughters of Thespius brought male children into the world, and some of them twins, particularly Procris the eldest, and the youngest. Some suppose that one of the Thespiades refused to admit Hercules to her arms, for which the hero condemned her to pass all her life in continual celibacy, and to become the priestess of a temple he had at Thespia. The children of the Thespiades, called Thespiadæ, went to Sardinia, where they made a settlement with Iolaus, the friend of their father. Thespius is often confounded by ancient authors with Thestius, though the latter lived in a different place, and, as king of Pleuron, sent his sons to the hunting of the Calydonian boar. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Paus. 9, c. 26 and 27.—Plut.

Thestius, I. a king of Pleuron, and a son of Parthaon, father to Toxeus, Plexippus, and Althæa.——II. A king of Thespia. Vid. Thespius.——The sons of Thestius, called Thestiadæ, were killed by Meleager, at the chase of the Calydonian boar. Apollod. 1, c. 7.

Thestor, a son of Idmon and Laothoe, father to Calchas. From him Calchas is often called Thestorides. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 19.—Stat. 1, Ach. v. 497.—Apollon. 1, v. 239.—Homer. Il. 1, v. 69.

Thetis, one of the sea-deities, daughter of Nereus, and Doris, often confounded with Tethys, her grandmother. She was courted by Neptune and Jupiter; but when the gods were informed that the son she should bring forth must become greater than his father, their addresses were stopped, and Peleus, the son of Æacus, was permitted to solicit her hand. Vid. Peleus. Thetis became mother of several children by Peleus, but all these she destroyed by fire, in attempting to see whether they were immortal. Achilles must have shared the same fate, if Peleus had not snatched him from her hand as she was going to repeat the cruel operation. She afterward rendered him invulnerable, by plunging him in the waters of the Styx, except that part of the heel by which she held him. As Thetis well knew the fate of her son, she attempted to remove him from the Trojan war, by concealing him in the court of Lycomedes. This was useless, he went with the rest of the Greeks. The mother, still anxious for his preservation, prevailed upon Vulcan to make him a suit of armour; but when it was done, she refused the god the favours which she had promised him. When Achilles was killed by Paris, Thetis issued out of the sea with the Nereides to mourn his death, and after she had collected his ashes in a golden urn, she raised a monument to his memory, and instituted festivals in his honour. *Hesiod. THOAS, I. a king of Taurica Chersonesus, in the age of Orestes and Pylades. He would have immolated these two celebrated strangers on Diana's altars, according to the barbarous customs of the country, had they not been delivered by Iphigenia. Vid. Iphigenia. According to some, Troas was the son of Borysthens. Ovid. Pont. 3, el. 2.——II. A king of Lemnos, son of Bacchus and Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, and husband of Myrine. He had been made king of Lemnos by Rhadamanthus. He was still alive when the Lemnian women conspired to kill all the males in the island, but his life was spared by his only daughter Hypsipyle, in whose favour he had resigned the crown. Hypsipyle obliged her father to depart secretly from Lemnos, to escape from the fury of the women, and he arrived safe in a neighbouring island, which some call Chios, though many suppose that Thoas was assassinated by the enraged females before he had left Lemnos. Some mythologists confound the king of Lemnos with that of Chersonesus, and suppose that they were one and the same man. According to their opinion, Thoas was very young when he retired from Lemnos, and after that he went to Taurica Chersonesus, where he settled. Flacc. 8, v. 208.—Hygin. fab. 74, 120.—Ovid. in Ib. 384. Heroid. 6, v. 114.—*Stat. THYÔNEUS, a surname of Bacchus.

TIBERINUS, son of Capetas, and king of Alba, was drowned in the river Albula, which, on that account, assumed the name of Tiberis, of which he became the protecting god. Liv. 1, c 3.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 20.—Varro de L. L. 4, c. 5, &c.—Ov. Fast. 2, v. 389, l. 4, v. 47.

TIBURTUS, the founder of Tibur, often called Tiburtia Mœnia. He was one of the sons of Amphiaraus. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 670.

TIMANDRA, a daughter of Leda, sister to Helen. She married Echemus of Arcadia.

TIPHYS, the pilot of the ship of the Argonauts, was son of Hagnius, or, according to some, of Phorbas. He died before the Argonauts reached Colchis, at the court of Lycus in the Propontis, and Erginus was chosen in his place. Orph.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—*Apollon.—Val. TIRESIAS, a celebrated prophet of Thebes, son of Everus and Chariclo. He lived to a great age, which some authors have called as long as seven generations of men, others six, and others nine, during the time that Polydorus, Labdacus, Laius, Œdipus, and his sons, sat on the throne of Thebes. It is said that in his youth he found two serpents on mount Cyllene, and that when he struck them with a stick to separate them, he found himself suddenly changed into a girl. Seven years after he found again some serpents together in the same manner, and he recovered his original sex by striking them a second time with his wand. When he was a woman, Tiresias had married, and it was from those reasons, according to some of the ancients, that Jupiter and Juno referred to his decision a dispute in which the deities wished to know which of the sexes received greater pleasure from the connubial state. Tiresias, who could speak from actual experience, decided in favour of Jupiter, and declared, that the pleasure which the female received was ten times greater than that of the male. Juno, who supported a different opinion, and gave the superiority to the male sex, punished Tiresias by depriving him of his eyesight. But this dreadful loss was in some measure repaired by Jupiter, who bestowed upon him the gift of prophecy, and permitted him to live seven times more than the rest of men. These causes of the blindness of Tiresias, which are supported by the authority of Ovid, Hyginus, and others, are contradicted by Apollodorus, Callimachus, Propertius, &c., who declared that this was inflicted upon him as a punishment, because he had seen Minerva bathing in the fountain Hippocrene, on the mount Helicon. Chariclo, who accompanied Minerva, complained of the severity with which her son was treated; but the goddess, who well knew that this was the irrevocable punishment inflicted by Saturn on such mortals as fix their eyes upon a goddess without her consent, alleviated the misfortunes of Tiresias, by making him acquainted with futurity, and giving him a staff which could conduct his steps with as much safety as if he had the use of his eyesight. During his lifetime Tiresias was an infallible oracle to all Greece. The generals, during the Theban war, consulted him, and found his predictions verified. He drew his prophecies sometimes from the flight or language of birds, in which he was assisted by his daughter Manto, and sometimes he drew the manes from the infernal regions to know futurity, with mystical ceremonies. He at last died, after drinking the waters of a cold fountain, which froze his blood. He was buried with great pomp by the Thebans on mount Tilphussus, and honoured as a god. His oracle at Orchomenos was in universal esteem. Homer represented Ulysses as going to the infernal regions to consult Tiresias concerning his return to Ithaca. Apollod. 3, c. 6.—*Theocrit. TIRYNTHIA, a name given to Alcmena, because she lived at Tirynthus. Ovid. Met. 6.

TISAMĒNES, or TISAMĒNUS, a king of Thebes, son of Thersander and grandson of Polynices. The furies, who continually persecuted the house of Œdipus, permitted him to live in tranquillity, but they tormented his son and successor Autesion, and obliged him to retire to Doris. Paus. 3, c. 5, l. 9, c. 6.

TISANDRUS, one of the Greeks concealed with Ulysses in the wooden horse. Some supposed him to be the same as Thersander, the son of Polynices. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 261.

TISIPHŌNE, I. one of the furies, daughter of Nox and Acheron, who was the minister of divine vengeance upon mankind, who visited them with plagues and diseases, and punished the wicked in Tartarus. She was represented with a whip in her hand, serpents hung from her head, and were wreathed round her arms instead of bracelets. By Juno's direction she attempted to prevent the landing of Io in Egypt, but the god of the Nile repelled her, and obliged her to retire to hell. Stat. Theb. 1, v. 59. —Virg. G. 3, v. 552. Æn. 6, v. 555.—Horat. 1, Sat. 8, v. 34.——II. A daughter of Alcmæon and Manto.

TITÆA, the mother of the Titans. She is supposed to be the same as Thea, Rhea, Terra, &c.

TITAN, or TITĀNUS, a son of Cœlus and Terra, brother to Saturn and Hyperion. He was the eldest of the children of Cœlus: but he gave his brother Saturn the kingdom of the world, provided he raised no male children. When the birth of Jupiter was concealed, Titan made war against Saturn, and with the assistance of his brothers, the Titans, he imprisoned him till he was replaced on his throne by his son Jupiter. This tradition is recorded by Lactantius, a Christian writer, who took it from the dramatic compositions of Ennius, now lost. None of the ancient mythologists, such as Apollodorus, Hesiod, Hyginus, &c. have made mention of Titan. Titan is a name applied to Saturn by Orpheus and Lucian; to the sun by Virgil and Ovid; and to Prometheus by Juvenal. Ovid. Met. 1, vi. 10.—Juv. 14, v. 35.—Diod. 5.—Paus. 2, c. 11.—Orpheus. Hymn. 13. —Virg. Æn. 4, v. 119.

TITĀNES, a name given to the sons of Cœlus and Terra. They were 45 in number, according to the Egyptians. Apollodorus mentions 13, Hyginus 6, and Hesiod 20, among whom are the Titanides. The most known of the Titans are Saturn, Hyperion, Oceanus, Japetus, Coltus, and Briareus, to whom Horace adds Typhœus, Mimas, Porphyrion, Rhœtus, and Enceladus, who are by other mythologists reckoned among the giants. They were all of a gigantic stature, and with proportionable strength. They were treated with great cruelty by Cœlus, and confined in the bowels of the earth, till their mother pitied their misfortunes and armed them against their father. Saturn with a scythe cut off the genitals of his father, as he was going to unite himself to Terra, and threw them into the sea, and from the froth sprang a new deity called Venus; as also Alecto, Tisiphone, and Megæra, according to Apollodorus. When Saturn succeeded his father, he married Rhea; but he devoured all his male children, as he had been informed by an oracle that he should be dethroned by them as a punishment for his cruelty to his father. The wars of the Titans against the gods are very celebrated in mythology. They are often confounded with that of the giants; but it is to be observed, that the war of the Titans was against Saturn, and that of the giants against Jupiter. *Hesiod. TITANIA, a patronymic applied to Pyrrha, as grand-daughter of Titan, and likewise to Diana. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 395, l. 2, &c.

TITANIDES, the daughters of Cœlus and Terra, reduced in number to six according to Orpheus. The most celebrated were Tethys, Themis, Dione, Thea, Mnemosyne, Ops, Cybele, Vesta, Phœbe, and Rhea. Hesiod. Theog. 135, &c. —Apollod. 1, c. 1.

TITHŌNUS, a son of Laomedon, king of Troy, by Strymo, the daughter of the Scamander. He was so beautiful that Aurora became enamoured of him, and carried him away. He had by her Memnon and Æmathion. He begged of Aurora to be immortal, and the goddess granted it; but as he had forgotten to ask the vigour, youth, and beauty, which he then enjoyed, he soon grew old, infirm, and decrepit; and, as life became insupportable to him, he prayed Aurora to remove him from the world. As he could not die, the goddess changed him into a cicada, or grasshopper. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Virg. G. 1, v. 447.—Æn. 4, v. 585, l. 8, v. 384.—Hesiod. Theog. 984.—Diod. 1.—*Ovid. TITIA, a deity among the Milesians.

TITYUS, a celebrated giant, son of Terra, or, according to others, of Jupiter by Elara, the daughter of Orchomenos. He was of such a prodigious size, that his mother died in travail after Jupiter had drawn her from the bowels of the earth, where she had been concealed to avoid the anger of Juno. Tityus attempted to offer violence to Latona, but the goddess delivered herself from his importunities, by calling to her assistance her children, who killed the giant with their arrows. He was placed in hell, where a serpent continually devoured his liver; or, according to others, where vultures perpetually fed upon his entrails, which grew again as soon as devoured. It is said that Tityus covered nine acres when stretched on the ground. He had a small chapel with an altar in the island of Eubœa. Apollod. 1, c. 4.—Pind. Pyth. 4.—*Homer. TLĒPŌLĒMUS, a son of Hercules and Astyochia, or, according to Pindar, of Astydamia. He was born at Argos. He left his native country after the accidental murder of Licymnius, and retired to Rhodes, by order of the oracle, where he was chosen king as being one of the sons of Hercules. He went to the Trojan war with nine ships, and was killed by Sarpedon. There were some festivals established at Rhodes to his honour, called Tlepolemia in which men and boys contended. The victors were rewarded with poplar crowns. Homer. Il. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Diod. 5.—Hygin. fab. 97.

Tmolus, a king of Lydia, who married Omphale, and was son of Sipylus and Chthonia. He was killed by a bull. The mountain on which he was buried bore his name. Apollod. 2, c. 6.—Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 1. Hygin. fab. 191. Vid. Part I.

Tolus, a man whose head was found in digging for the foundation of the capitol, in the reign of Tarquin, whence the Romans concluded that their city should become the head or mistress of the world.

Toxeus, a son of Œneus, killed by Meleager.

Triopas, or Triops, a son of Neptune by Canace, the daughter of Æolus. He was father of Iphimedia and of Erisichthon, who is called on that account Triopeius, and his daughter Triopeis. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 754.—Apollod. 1, c. 7.

Triptolemus, a son of Oceanus and Terra, or, according to some, of Trochilus, a priest of Argos. According to the more received opinion he was son of Celeus, king of Attica, by Neræa, whom some have called Metanira, Cothonea, Hyona, Melania, or Polymnia. He was born at Eleusis in Attica, and was cured in his youth of a severe illness by the care of Ceres, who had been invited into the house of Celeus by the monarch's children, as she travelled over the country in quest of her daughter. To repay the kindness of Celeus, the goddess took particular notice of his son. She fed him with her own milk, and placed him on burning coals during the night, to destroy whatever particles of mortality he had received from his parents. The mother was astonished at the uncommon growth of her son, and she had the curiosity to watch Ceres. She disturbed the goddess by a sudden cry, when Triptolemus was laid on the burning ashes, and as Ceres was therefore unable to make him immortal, she taught him agriculture, and rendered him serviceable to mankind, by instructing him how to sow corn and make bread. She also gave him her chariot, which was drawn by two dragons; and in this celestial vehicle he travelled all over the earth, and distributed corn to all the inhabitants of the world. In Scythia the favourite of Ceres nearly lost his life; but Lyncus, the king of the country, who had conspired to murder him, was changed into a lynx. At his return to Eleusis, Triptolemus restored Ceres her chariot, and established the Eleusinian festivals and mysteries in honour of the deity. He reigned for some time, and after death received divine honours. Some suppose that he accompanied Bacchus in his Indian expedition. *Diod. Triton, a sea-deity, son of Neptune, by Amphitrite, or, according to some, by Celeno, or Salacia. He was very powerful among the sea-deities, and could calm the ocean and abate storms at pleasure. He is generally represented as blowing a shell; his belly, above the waist, is like that of a man, and below, a dolphin. Some represent him with the fore-feet of a horse. Many of the sea-deities are called Tritons, but the name is generally applied to those only who are half men and half fish. Apollod. 1, c. 4.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 930.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 333.—Cic. de Nat. D. 1, c. 28.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 148, l. 6, v. 173. Paus. 9, c. 20. Vid. Part I.

Trivia, a surname given to Diana, because she presided over all places where three roads met. At the new moon the Athenians offered her sacrifices, and a sumptuous entertainment, which was generally distributed among the poor. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 13, l. 7, v. 774.—*Ovid. Tydeus, a son of Œneus, king of Calydon and Peribœa. He fled from his country after the accidental murder of one of his friends, and found a safe asylum in the court of Adrastus, king of Argos, whose daughter Deiphyle he married. When Adrastus wished to replace his son-in-law Polynices on the throne of Thebes, Tydeus undertook to go and declare war against Eteocles, who usurped the crown. The reception he met provoked his resentment; he challenged Eteocles and his officers to single combat, and defeated them. On his return to Argos, he slew 50 of the Thebans who had conspired against his life and laid in ambush to surprise him; and only one of the number was permitted to return to Thebes, to bear the tidings of the fate of his companions. He was one of the seven chiefs of the army of Adrastus, and during the Theban war he behaved with great courage. Many of the enemies expired under his blows, till he was at last wounded by Melanippus. Though the blow was fatal, Tydeus had the strength to dart at his enemy, and to bring him to the ground, before he was carried away from the fight by his companions. At his own request the dead body of Melanippus was brought to him, and after he had ordered the head to be cut off, he began to tear out the brains with his teeth. The savage barbarity of Tydeus displeased Minerva, who was coming to bring him relief, and to make him immortal, and the goddess left him to his fate and suffered him to die. He was buried at Argos, where his monument was still to be seen in the age of Pausanias. He was father to Diomedes. Some suppose that the cause of his flight to Argos was the murder of the son of Melus, or, according to others, of Alcathous his father's brother, or perhaps his own brother Olenius. Homer. Il. 4, v. 365, 387.—Apollod. 1, c. 8, l. 3, c. 6.—Æschyl. Sept. ante Theb.—Paus. 9, c. 18.—Diod. 2.—Eurip. in Sup.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 479.—Ovid. in Ib. 350, &c.

Tyndaridæ, I. a patronymic of the children of Tyndarus, as Castor, Pollux, Helen,

&c. Ovid. Met. 8.——II. A people of Colchis.

TYNDĂREUS, son of Œbalus and Gorgophone, or, according to some, of Perieres. He was king of Lacedæmon, and married the celebrated Leda, who bore him Timandra, Philonoe, &c. and also became mother of Pollux and Helen by Jupiter. Vid. Leda, Castor, Pollux, Clytemnestra, &c.

TYPHŒUS, or TYPHON, a famous giant, son of Tartarus and Terra, who had a hundred heads like those of a serpent or a dragon. Flames of devouring fire were darted from his mouth and from his eyes, and he uttered horrid yells, like the dissonant shrieks of different animals. He was no sooner born, than, to avenge the death of his brothers the giants, he made war against heaven. The father of the gods at last put Typhœus to fight with his thunderbolt, and crushed him under mount Ætna, in the island of Sicily, or, according to some, under the island Inarime. Typhœus became father of Geryon, Cerberus, and Orthos, by his union with Echidna. Hygin. fab. 152 and 196. —Ovid. Met. 5, v. 325.—Æschyl. sept. ante Theb.—Hesiod. Theog. 820.—Homer. Hym.—Herodot. 2, c. 156.

TYPHON, I. a giant whom Juno produced by striking the earth. Some of the poets make him the same as the famous Typhœus. Vid. Typhœus.——II. A brother of Osiris, who married Nepthys. He laid snares for his brother during his expedition, and murdered him at his return. The death of Osiris, was avenged by his son Orus, and Typhon was put to death. Vid Osiris. He was reckoned among the Egyptians to be the cause of every evil, and on that account generally represented as a wolf and a crocodile. Plut. in Is. & Os.—Diod. 1.

TYRO, a beautiful nymph, daughter of Salmoneus, king of Elis and Alcidice. She was treated with great severity by her mother-in-law Sidero, and at last removed from her father's house by her uncle Cretheus. She became enamoured of the Enipeus; and as she often walked on the banks of the river, Neptune assumed the shape of her favourite lover and gained her affections. She had two sons, Pelias and Neleus, by Neptune, whom she exposed, to conceal her incontinence from the world. The children were preserved by shepherds, and when they had arrived to years of maturity, they avenged their mother's injuries by assassinating the cruel Sidero. Some time after her amour with Neptune, Tyro married her uncle Cretheus, by whom she had Amythaon, Pheres, and Æson. Tyro is often called Salmonis from her father. Homer. Od. 11, v. 234.—Pindar. Pyth. 4.—Apollod. 1. c. 9.—Diod. 4.—Propert. 1, el. 13, v. 20, l. 2, el. 30, v. 51, l. 3, el. 19, v. 13.—Ovid. Am. 3, el. 6, v. 43. —Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 42.

TYRRHEUS, a shepherd of King Latinus, whose stag being killed by the companions of Ascanius, was the first cause of war between Æneas and the inhabitants of Latium. Hence the word Tyrrheides. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 485.

V.

VACŪNA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over repose and leisure, as the word indicates (vacare). Her festivals were observed in the month of December. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 307.—Horat. 1, ep. 10, v. 49.

VEJŎVIS, or VEJUPITER, a deity of ill omen at Rome. He had a temple on the Capitoline hill, built by Romulus. Some suppose that he was the same as Jupiter the infant, or in the cradle, because he was represented without thunder or a sceptre, and had only by his side the great Amalthæa, and the Cretan nymph who fed him when young. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 430.

VĔNILIA, a nymph, sister to Amata, and mother of Turnus by Daunus. Amphitrite, the sea-goddess, is also called Venilia. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 76.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 334.—Varro de L. L. 4, c. 10.

VENTI. The ancients, and especially the Athenians, paid particular attention to the winds, and offered them sacrifices as to deities, intent upon the destruction of mankind, by continually causing storms, tempests, and earthquakes. The winds were represented in different attitudes and forms. The four principal winds were, Eurus, the southeast, who is represented as a young man flying with great impetuosity, and often appearing in a playsome and wanton humour. Auster, the south wind, appeared generally as an old man with gray hair, a gloomy countenance, a head covered with clouds, a sable vesture, and dusky wings. He is the dispenser of rain, and of all heavy showers. Zephyrus is represented as the mildest of all the winds. He is young and gentle, and his lap is filled with vernal flowers. He married Flora the goddess, with whom he enjoyed the most perfect felicity. Boreas, the north wind, appears always rough and shivering. He is the father of rain, snow, hail, and tempests, and is always represented as surrounded with impenetrable clouds. Those of inferior note were Solanus, whose name is seldom mentioned. He appears as a young man, holding fruit in his lap, such as peaches, oranges, &c. Africus, or southwest, represented with black wings and a melancholy countenance. Corus, or northwest, drives clouds of snow before him; and Aquilo, the northeast, is equally dreadful in appearance. The winds, according to some mythologists, were confined in a large cave, of which Æolus had the management, and without this necessary precaution they would have overturned the earth, and reduced every thing to its original chaos. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 57, &c.

VĔNUS, I. one of the most celebrated deities of the ancients. She was the goddess of beauty, the mother of love, the queen of laughter, the mistress of graces and of pleasures, and the patroness of courtesans. Some mythologists speak of more than one Venus. Plato mentions two, Venus Urania, the daughter of Uranus, and Venus Popularia, the daughter of Jupiter and Dione. Cicero speaks of four, a daughter of Cœlus and Light, one sprung from the froth of the sea, a third, daughter of Jupiter and the Nereid Diane, and a fourth born at Tyre, and the same as the Astarte of the Syrians. Of these, however, the Venus sprung from the froth of the sea, after the mutilated part of the body of Uranus had been thrown there by Saturn, is the most known; and of her in particular, ancient mythologists, as well as painters, make mention. She arose from the sea near the island of Cyprus, or, according to Hesiod, of Cythera, whither she was wafted by the zephyrs, and received on the seashore by the Seasons, daughters of Jupiter and Themis. She was soon after carried to heaven, where all the gods admired her beauty, and all the goddesses became jealous of her personal charms. Jupiter gave her in marriage to his ugly and deformed son Vulcan. Her intrigue with Mars is the most celebrated. She was caught in her lover's arms, and exposed to the ridicule and laughter of all the gods. Venus became mother of Hermione, Cupid, and Anteros, by Mars; by Mercury, she had Hermaphroditus; by Bacchus, Priapus; and by Neptune, Eryx. Her great partiality for Adonis made her abandon the seats of Olympus; and her regard for Anchises obliged her often to visit the woods and solitary retreats of mount Ida. The power of Venus over the heart was supported and assisted by a celebrated girdle, called zone by the Greeks and cestus by the Latins. This mysterious girdle gave beauty, grace, and elegance, when worn even by the most deformed; it excited love and rekindled extinguished flames. Juno herself was indebted to this powerful ornament to gain the favours of Jupiter, and Venus, though herself possessed of every charm, no sooner put on her cestus, than Vulcan, unable to resist the influence of love, forgot all the intrigues and infidelities of his wife, and fabricated arms even for her illegitimate children. The contest of Venus for the golden apple of Discord is well known. She gained the prize over Pallas and Juno, (Vid. Paris, Discordia,) and rewarded her impartial judge with the hand of the fairest woman in the world. The worship of Venus was universally established; statues and temples were erected to her in every kingdom, and the ancients were fond of paying homage to a divinity who presided over generation, and by whose influence alone mankind existed. In her sacrifices, and in the festivals celebrated in her honour, too much licentiousness prevailed, and public prostitution was often a part of the ceremony. Victims were seldom offered to her, or her altars stained with blood, though we find Aspasia making repeated sacrifices. No pigs, however, or male animals were deemed acceptable. The rose, the myrtle, and the apple, were sacred to Venus, and among birds, the dove, the swan, and the sparrow, were her favourites; and among fishes, those called the aphya and the lycostomus. The goddess of beauty was represented among the ancients in different forms. At Elis she appeared seated on a goat, with one foot resting on a tortoise. At Sparta and Cythera she was represented armed like Minerva, and sometimes wearing chains on her feet. In the temple of Jupiter Olympias she was represented by Phidias as rising from the sea, received by love, and crowned by the goddess of persuasion. At Cnidos, her statue, made by Praxiteles, represented her naked, with one hand hiding what modesty keeps concealed. Her statue at Elephantis was the same, with only a naked Cupid by her side. In Sicyon she held a poppy in one hand, and in the other an apple; while on her head she had a crown, which terminated in a point to intimate the pole. She is generally represented with her son Cupid, on a chariot drawn by doves, or at other times by swans or sparrows. The surnames of the goddess are numerous, and only serve to show how well established her worship was all over the earth. She was called Cypria, because particularly worshipped in the island of Cyprus, and in that character she was often represented with a beard, and with a sceptre in her hand, and the body and dress of a female, whence she is called duplex Amathusa by Catullus. She received the name of Paphia, because worshipped at Paphos, where she had a temple with an altar, on which rain never fell, though exposed in the open air. Some of the ancients call her Apostrophia, or Epistrophia: as also Venus Urania and Venus Pandemos. The Cnidians raised her temples under the name of Venus Acræa, of Doris, and of Euplœa. In her temple under the name of Euplœa, at Cnidos, was the most celebrated of her statues, being the most perfect piece of Praxiteles. Venus was also surnamed Cytherœa, because she was the chief deity of Cythera; Philommeis, because the queen of laughter; Telessigama, because she presided over marriage; Coliada, Colotis, or Colias, because worshipped on a promontory of the same name in Attica; Area, because armed like Mars; Verticordia, because she could turn the hearts of women to cultivate chastity; Apularia, because she deceived; Calva, because she was represented bald; Ericyna, because worshipped at Eryx; Etaira, because the patroness of courtesans; Acidalia, because of a fountain of Orchomenos; Basilea, because the queen of love; Myrtea, because the myrtle was sacred to her; Mechanitis, in allusion to the many artifices practised in love, &c., &c. As the goddess of the sea, because born in the bosom of the waters, Venus was called Pontia, Marina, Lymnesia, Epipontia, Pelagia, Saligenia, Pontogenia, Aligenia, Thalassia, &c., and, as rising from the sea, the name of Anadyomene, is applied to her, and rendered immortal by the celebrated painting of Apelles, which represented her as issuing from the bosom of the waves, and wringing her tresses on her shoulder. Vid. Anadyomene. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 27, l. 3, c. 22.—Orph. Hymn. 54.—Hesiod. Theog.—Sappho.—Homer. Hymn. in Ven., &c.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 800, &c.—*Ovid. A planet, called by the Greeks Phosphorus, and by the Latins Lucifer, when it rises before the sun, but when it follows it, Hesperus or Vesper. Cic. de Nat. 2, c. 20, in somn. Scip.

VERITAS, (truth,) was not only personified by the ancients, but also made a deity, and called the daughter of Saturn and the mother of Virtue. She was represented like a young virgin, dressed in white apparel, with all the marks of youthful diffidence and modesty. Democritus used to say that she hid herself at the bottom of a well, to intimate the difficulty with which she is found.

VERTICORDIA. Vid. Venus.

VERTUMNUS, a deity among the Romans, who presided over the spring and over orchards.

He endeavoured to gain the affections of the goddess Pomona; and, to effect this, he assumed the shape and dress of a fisherman, of a soldier, a peasant, a reaper, &c., but all to no purpose, till, under the form of an old woman, he prevailed upon his mistress and married her. He is generally represented as a young man crowned with flowers, covered up to the waist, and holding in his right hand fruit, and a crown of plenty in his left. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 642, &c. —Propert. 4, el. 2, v. 2.—Horat. Sat. 7, v. 14.

Vesta, a goddess, daughter of Rhea and Saturn, sister to Ceres and Juno. She is often confounded by the mythologists with Rhea, Ceres, Cybele, Proserpine, Hecate, and Tellus. When considered as the mother of the gods, she is the mother of Rhea and Saturn; and when considered as the patroness of the vestal virgins and the goddess of fire, she is called the daughter of Saturn and Rhea. Under this last name she was worshipped by the Romans. Æneas was the first who introduced her mysteries into Italy, and Numa built her a temple, where no males were permitted to go. The Palladium of Troy was supposed to be preserved within her sanctuary, and a fire was continually kept lighted by a certain number of virgins, who had dedicated themselves to the service of the goddess. Vid. Vestales. If the fire of Vesta was ever extinguished, it was supposed to threaten the republic with some sudden calamity. The virgin by whose negligence it had been extinguished was severely punished, and it was kindled again by the rays of the sun. The temple of Vesta was of a round form, and the goddess was represented in a long flowing robe, with a veil on her head, holding in one hand a lamp, or a two-eared vessel, and in the other a javelin, or sometimes a palladium. On some medals she appears holding a drum in one hand, and a small figure of victory in the other. Hesiod. Theog. v. 454.—Cic. de Leg. 2, c. 12.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 296. —Died. 5.—Ovid. Fast. 6.—Trist. 3.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1.—Plut. in Num.—Paus. 5, c. 14.

Vica Pota, a goddess at Rome, who presided over victory (a vincere and potiri.) Liv. 2, c. 7.

Victoria, one of the deities of the Romans, called by the Greeks Nice, supposed to be the daughter of the giant Pallas, or Titan and Styx. The goddess of Victory was sister to Strength and Valour, and was one of the attendants of Jupiter. She was greatly honoured by the Greeks, particularly at Athens. Sylla raised her a temple at Rome, and instituted festivals in her honour. She was represented with wings, crowned with laurel, and holding the branch of a palm-tree in her hand. A golden statue of this goddess, weighing 320 pounds, was presented to the Romans by Hiero, king of Syracuse, and deposited in the temple of Jupiter, on the Capitoline hill. Liv. 22.—Varro. de L. L.—Hesiod. Theog.—Hygin. præf. fab. —Suet.

Viriplaca, a goddess among the Romans who presided over the peace of families, whence her name, (virum placare.) If any quarrel happened between a man and his wife, they generally repaired to the temple of the goddess, which was erected on the Palatine mount, and came back reconciled. Val. Max. c. 1.

Virtus. All virtues were made deities among the Romans. Marcellus erected two temples, one to Virtue and the other to Honour. They were built in such a manner, that to see the temple of Honour it was necessary to pass through that of Virtue; a happy allegory among a nation free and independent. The principal virtues were distinguished each by their attire. Prudence was known by her rule and her pointing to a globe at her feet; Temperance had a bridle; Justice held an equal balance; and Fortitude leant against her sword; Honesty was clad in a transparent vest; Modesty appeared veiled; Clemency wore an olive branch, and Devotion threw incense upon an altar; Tranquillity was seen to lean on a column; Health was known by her serpent, Liberty by her cap, and Gayety by her myrtle. Cic. de N. D. 2, c. 23.—Plaut. in amph. prol.—Liv. 29, c. 11.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1.—Aug. de Civ. D. 4, c. 20.

Vitula, a deity among the Romans who presided over festivals and rejoicings. Macrob. 3, c. 2.

Ulysses. Vid. Part II.

Unca, a surname of Minerva among the Phœnicians and Thebans.

Unigena, a surname of Minerva, as sprung of Jupiter alone.

Unxia, a surname of Juno, derived from ungere, to anoint, because it was usual among the Romans for the bride to anoint the threshold of her husband, and from this necessary ceremony wives were called Unxores, and afterwards Uxores, from Unxia, who presided over them. Arnob. 3.

Volumnæ Fanum, a temple in Etruria, sacred to the goddess Volumna, where the states of the country used to assemble. Viterbo now stands on the spot. Liv. 4, c. 23, l. 5, c. 17, l. 6, c. 2.

Volumnus, and Volumna, two deities who presided over the will. They were chiefly invoked at marriages, to preserve concord between the husband and wife. They were particularly worshipped by the Etrurians. Liv. 4, c. 61.

Voluptas, and Volupia, the goddess of sensual pleasures, worshipped at Rome, where she had a temple. She was represented as a young and beautiful woman, well dressed, and elegantly adorned, seated on a throne, and having virtue under her feet. Cic. de N. D. 2, c. 23. —Macrob. 1, c. 10.—Aug de Civ. D. 4, c. 8.

Upis, the father of one of the Dianas mentioned by the ancients, from which circumstance Diana herself is called Upis. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.—Callim. in Dian.

Urania, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne, who presided over astronomy. She is generally called mother of Linus by Apollo, and of the god Hymenæus by Bacchus. She was represented as a young virgin dressed in an azure-coloured robe, crowned with stars, and holding a globe in her hands, and having many mathematical instruments placed round. Hesiod Theog. Ti.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Hygin. fab. 161.——A surname of Venus, the same as Celestial. She was supposed, in that character, to preside over beauty and generation, and was called daughter of Uranus or Cœlus by the Light. Her temples in Asia, Africa, Greece, and Italy, were numerous. Plato. in Symp.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.—Paus. 1, c. 14, &c., l. 7, c. 26, &c.

Urānus, or Ouranus, a deity, the same as Cœlus, the most ancient of all the gods. He married Tithea, or the Earth, by whom he had Ceus, Creus, Hyperion, Mnemosyne, Cottus, Phœbe, Briareus, Thetis, Saturn, Giges, called from their mother Titans. His children conspired against him, because he confined them in the bosom of the earth, and his son Saturn mutilated him, and drove him from his throne.

Vulcānus, a god of the ancients who presided over fire, and was the patron of all artists who worked iron and metals. He was son of Juno alone, who in this wished to imitate Jupiter, who had produced Minerva from his brains. According to Homer he was son of Jupiter and Juno, and the mother was so disgusted with the deformities of her son, that she threw him into the sea as soon as born, where he remained for nine years. According to the more received opinion, Vulcan was educated in heaven with the rest of the gods, but his father kicked him down from Olympus, when he attempted to deliver his mother, who had been fastened by a golden chain for her insolence. He was nine days in coming from heaven upon earth, and he fell in the island of Lemnos, where, according to Lucian, the inhabitants seeing him in the air, caught him in their arms. He, however, broke his leg by the fall, and ever after remained lame of one foot. He fixed his residence in Lemnos, where he built himself a palace, and raised forges to work metals. The inhabitants of the island became sensible of his industry, and were taught all the useful arts which could civilize their rude manners, and render them serviceable to the good of society. The first work of Vulcan was, according to some, a throne of gold with secret springs, which he presented to his mother, to avenge himself for her want of affection towards him. Juno no sooner was seated on the throne than she found herself unable to move. The gods attempted to deliver her by breaking the chains which held her, but to no purpose; and Vulcan alone had the power to set her at liberty. Bacchus intoxicated him, and prevailed upon him to come to Olympus, where he was reconciled to his parents. Vulcan has been celebrated by the ancient poets for the ingenious works and automatical figures which he made; and many speak of two golden statues, which not only seemed animated, but which walked by his side, and even assisted him in the working of metals. It is said, that at the request of Jupiter he made the first woman that ever appeared on earth, well known under the name of Pandora. Vid. Pandora. The Cyclops of Sicily were his ministers and attendants; and with him they fabricated, not only the thunderbolts of Jupiter, but also arms for the gods and the most celebrated heroes. His forges were supposed to be under mount Ætna in the island of Sicily, as well as in every part of the earth where there were volcanoes. The most known of the works of Vulcan which were presented to mortals, are the arms of Achilles, those of Æneas, the shield of Hercules described by Hesiod, a collar given to Hermione the wife of Cadmus, and a sceptre which was in the possession of Agamemnon king of Argos and Mycenæ. The collar proved fatal to all those that wore it, but the sceptre, after the death of Agamemnon, was carefully preserved at Cheronæa, and regarded as a divinity. The amours of Vulcan are not numerous. He demanded Minerva from Jupiter, who had promised him in marriage whatever goddess he should choose, and when she refused his addresses, he attempted to offer her violence. Minerva resisted with success, though there remained on her body some marks of Vulcan's passion, which she threw down upon earth wrapped up in wool. Vid. Erichthonius. This disappointment in his love was repaired by Jupiter, who gave him one of the Graces. Venus is universally acknowledged to have been the wife of Vulcan; her infidelity is well known, as well as her amours with Mars, which were discovered by Phœbus, and exposed to the gods by her own husband. The worship of Vulcan was well established, particularly in Egypt, at Athens and at Rome. It was usual in the sacrifices that were offered to him to burn the whole victim, and not reserve part of it as in the immolations to the rest of the gods. A calf and a boar-pig were the principal victims offered. Vulcan was represented as covered with sweat, blowing with his nervous arm the fires of his forges. His breast was hairy, and his forehead was blackened with smoke. Some represent him lame and deformed, holding a hammer raised in the air ready to strike; while with the other hand he turns, with pincers, a thunderbolt on his anvil, for which an eagle waits by his side to carry it to Jupiter. He appears on some monuments with a long beard, dishevelled hair, half naked, and a small round cap on his head, while he holds a hammer and pincers in his hand. The Egyptians represented him under the figure of a monkey. Vulcan has received the names of Mulciber, Pamphanes, Clytotechnes, Pandamator, Cyllopodes, Chalaipoda, &c., all expressive of his lameness and his profession. He was father of Cupid by Venus; of Cæculus, Cecrops, Cacus, Periphetes, Cercyon, Ocrisia, &c. Cicero speaks of more than one deity of the name of Vulcan. One he calls son of Cœlus, and father of Apollo by Minerva; the second he mentions is son of the Nile, and called Phtas by the Egyptians; the third was the son of Jupiter and Juno, and fixed his residence in Lemnos; and the fourth, who built his forges in the Lipari islands, was son of Menalius. Vulcan seems to have been admitted into heaven more for ridicule than any other purpose; and even his wife is represented as laughing at his deformities, and mimicking his lameness to gain the smiles of her lovers. Hes. Theog. & in Suet. Herc. 140 and 320.—Apollod. 1, c. 3, &c.—Homer. Il. 1, v. 57, and l. 15, v. 18, l. 11, v. 397, &c.—Diod. 5.—Paus. 1, c. 20, l. 3, 17.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 22.—Herodot. 2 and 3.—Varro. de L. L.—Virg. Æn. 7, &c.

X.

Xuthus, a son of Hellen, grandson of Deucalion. He was banished from Thessaly by his brothers and came to Athens, where he married Creusa, the daughter of King Erechtheus, by whom he had Achæus and Ion. He retired after the death of his father-in-law into Achaia, where he died. According to some, he had no children, but adopted Ion, the son whom Creusa, before her marriage, had born to Apollo.

Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Paus. 7, c. 1.—Eurip. in Ion. 1, sc. 1.

Z.

ZACYNTHUS. Vid. Part II.

ZETHES, ZETES, or ZETUS, a son of Boreas, king of Thrace and Orithya, who accompanied, with his brother Calais, the Argonauts to Colchis. In Bithynia, the two brothers, who are represented with wings, delivered Phineus from the continual persecution of the Harpies, and drove these monsters as far as the islands called Strophades, where at last they were stopped by Iris, who promised them that Phineus should no longer be tormented by them. They were both killed, as some say, by Hercules, during the Argonautic expedition, and were changed into those winds which generally blow 8 or 10 days before the dogstar appears, and are called Prodromi by the Greeks. Their sister Cleopatra married Phineus king of Bithynia. Orpheus. Arg.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 15.—Hygin. fab. 14.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 716.—Paus. 3, c. 18.—Val. Flacc.

ZETUS, or ZETHUS, a son of Jupiter and Antiope, brother to Amphion. Vid. Antiope. The crown of Thebes was seized by the two brothers, not only as the reward of this victory, but as their inheritance, and Zethus surrounded the capital of his dominions with a strong wall, while his brother amused himself with playing on his lyre. Music and verses were disagreeable to Zethus, and according to some, he prevailed upon his brother no longer to pursue so unproductive a study. Hygin. fab. 7.—Paus. 2, c. 6, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 5 and 10.—Horat. 1, ep. 18, v. 41.

ZEUS, a name of Jupiter among the Greeks, expressive of his being the father of mankind, and by whom all things live. Diod. 5.

ZEUXIPPE, I. a daughter of Eridanus, mother of Butes, one of the Argonauts, &c. Apollod. 3, c. 15.——II. A daughter of Laomedon. She married Sicyon, who after his father-in-law's death, became king of that city of Peloponnesus which from him has been called Sicyon. Paus. 2, c. 6.

ZOSTERIA, a surname of Minerva. She had two statues under that name in the city of Thebes in Boeotia. The word signifies girt, or armed for battle, words synonymous among the ancients. Paus. 9, c. 17.—Homer. Il. 2, v. 478, l. 11, v. 15.

ZYGIA, a surname of Juno, because she presided over marriage, (ἀπὸ ζευγνυμι jungo.) She is the same as the Pronuba of the Latins. Pindar.—Pollux. 3, c. 3.

A CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE,

From the Creation of the World to the fall of the Roman Empire in the west and in the east.

	Before Christ.*

Jerusalem taken by Nebuchadnezzar, 9th of June, after a siege of 18 months	587

* In the following Table, I have confined myself to the more easy and convenient eras of before, (B. C.) and after, (A. D.) Christ. For the sake of those, however, that do not wish the exclusion of the Julian period, it is necessary to observe, that, as the first year of the Christian era always falls on the 4714th of the Julian years, the number required either before or after Christ, will easily be discovered by the application of the rules of subtraction or addition. The era from the foundation of Rome (A. U. C.) will be found with the same facility, by recollecting that the city was built 753 years before Christ; and the Olympiads can likewise be recurred to by the consideration, that the conquest of Coræbus (B. C. 776,) forms the first Olympiad, and the Olympic games were celebrated after the revolution of four years.

B. C.
	The Isthmian games restored, and celebrated every 1st and 3d year of the Olympiads
592	Death of Jeremiah the prophet
577	The Nemæan games restored

The Romans divided the Sextarius, like the libra, into 12 equal parts, called Cyathi, and therefore their calices were called sextantes, quadrantes, trientes, &c. according to the number of cyathi which they contained.

N. B. The Roman ounce is the English avoirdupois ounce, which was anciently divided into seven denarii and eight drachmæ, and as they reckon their denarius equal to an Attic drachma, the Attic weights were 1-8th heavier than the corresponding weights among the Romans.

The Greeks divided their obolus into chalci and smaller proportions; some into six chalci, and every chalcus into seven smaller parts; and others divided it into eight chalci, and each chalcus into eight parts.

N. B. There was also another Attic talent, which consisted of 80, or, according to some, of 100 minæ. It must however be remembered, that every mina contains 100 drachmæ, and every talent 60 minæ. The talents differ according to the different standard of their minæ and drachmæ, as the following table indicates:

N. B. The Drachmæ, and the Didrachmon, were silver, the others generally of brass. The Tridrachmon, Triobolus, &c. were sometimes coined. The Drachmæ and the Denarius, are here supposed to be equal, though often the former exceeded in weight.

The gold coin among the Greeks was the stater aureus, which weighed two Attic Drachmæ, or half the stater argenteus, and was worth 25 Attic Drachmæ of silver, or

	l.	s.	d.	q.
The Roman gold coin was the aureus, which generally weighed double the denarius.
The value of it, according to the first proportion of coinage mentioned by Pliny, was	1	4	3	3
Or according to the proportion of coinage at present - - - -	1	0	9
According to the decuple or proportion mentioned by Livy and Julius Pollux - -	0	12	11
According to Tacitus, as it was afterwards valued and exchanged for 25 denarii -	0	16	1	3

The value of coin underwent many changes during the existence of the Roman republic, and stood, as Pliny mentions it, as follows:

In the reign of Servius - -	The as weighed of brass	1 pound
A. U. C. 490 - -		2 ounces
A. U. C. 537 - -		1 ounce
A. U. C. 586 - -		½ ounce

A. U. C. 485 - -	The denarius exchanged for	10 asses
A. U. C. 537 - -		10 asses

A. U. C. 574, a scruple of gold was worth 20 sestertii; coined afterwards of the pound of gold, 20 denarii aurei; and in Nero's reign, of the pound of gold, 45 denarii aurei.

N. B. In the above tables of money, it is to be observed, that the silver has been reckoned at 5*s.* and gold at 4*l.* per ounce.

The greater talent of the Romans was worth 99*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* and the less 60*l.* or, as some say, 75*l.* and the great talent 1125*l.*

The value of the Roman pondo is not precisely known, though some suppose it equivalent to an Attic mina, or 3*l.* 4*s.* 7*d.* It is used indifferently by ancient authors for æs, as, and mina, and was supposed to consist of 100, or 96 denarii. It is to be observed, that whenever the word pondo is joined to numbers, it signifies the same as libra; but when it is used with other words, it bears the same signification as the σαθμη or ομκη of the Greeks, or the pondus of the Latins. The word nummus, when mentioned as a sum of money, was supposed to be equivalent to a sestertius, and though the words sestertius and nummus are often joined together, yet their signification is the same, and they intimate no more than either does separately.

We must particularly remark, that in reckoning their sesterces, the Romans had an art which can be rendered intelligible by the observation of these rules: If a numeral noun agreed in case, gender, and number, with the word sestertius, it denoted precisely as many sestertii, as for example, decem sestertii was ten sestertii. If a numeral noun of another case was joined with the genitive plural of sestertius, it denoted so many thousand, as decem sestertium signifies so many thousand sestertii. If the adverb numeral was joined, it denoted so many hundred thousand, as decies sestertium was ten hundred thousand sestertii. If the numeral adverb was put by itself, the signification was not altered; therefore decies, vigesies, &c. in a sentence, imply as many hundred thousand sestertii, or hundred sestertia, as if the word sestertium was expressed.

The denarius, which was the chief silver coin used at Rome, received its name because it contained denos æris, ten asses.

The as is often expressed by an L. because it is one pound weight; and the sestertius, because it was equivalent to two pound and a half of brass, is frequently denoted by H. S. or L. L. S.

The Roman libra contained twelve ounces of silver, and was worth about 3*l.* sterling.

The Roman talent was supposed to be equivalent to twenty-four sestertia, or nearly 103*l.* sterling.
